THE REV. DR. CHALMERS,

THE FOLLOWING PAGES ARE,

WITH SINCERE RESPECT AND ESTEEM,

INSCRIBED BY

THE AUTHOR.

THE somewhat lengthened interval which has clapsed since the publication of the Third series of a little work, for the vigorous prosecution of which, undescreed encouragement from eminent authorities had been kindly afforded-has arisen partly from the author's prolonged absence-and still more, from the obvious difficulties attendant on the portion of Scripture to which her former elucidations had extended; and from which, she could not (without further impairing the unity and completeness of her work) consistently turn That she has not shrunk from encountering them, will form matter for thankfulness, should the present conversations be found calculated (by the blessing of God) to simplify to parents-less favoured with leisure for research-the task of directing the inferences drawn by the young, from a portion of Holy Writ, which,—while its interest must necessarily render it always a favourite study with them—judicious explanation alone, can render a profitable one.

In this—certainly not the least arduous of her attempts to elucidate Scripture—the Writer has, of course, availed herself of the many minute facts and coincidences, brought to bear on the interesting subject, by the learning and industry of the eminent biographers of David. But it is not in the idle hope of superseding, or arrogant presumption of undervaluing their elaborate and useful works, that she ventures to say-for the encouragement of parents and teachers, humble and unlearned as herself—that successful appeals to the feelings, or even understandings of young people, are more likely to be drawn from simple investigation of, and reflection on the actual text of Scripture (suggested at the moment of perusal) than by reference to the more deliberate and formal inferences of the most celebrated writers. Children must be addressed to, and from the heart. And when that is warmed, as it were, and often unexpectedly illuminated, by the direct rays emanating from the Word of Truth—conclusions may be less logical—and arguments less precise—but the "word spoken" may nevertheless "profit" —more than volumes, read with listless acquiescence, apart from the Scriptures they illustrate.

Were any thing wanting to convince the writer of these pages, of the possible efficacy of the conversational system adopted by her, on the minds of others—it would be supplied by her own experience of the wonderful power, with which detailed investigation has frequently invested the simplest words of Holy Writ—the 'starting up' as it were, of conscience, at the Ithuriel touch of some searching passage—and the hourly increased conviction, impressed by the sifting process—of man's inconsistency, and of the miraculous harmony of the inspired word of God.

If any portion of these invaluable feelings shall be communicated, by means of the following pages, to one thoughtless young, or unreflecting older human bosom—it will be gratefully ascribed to the blessing of Him, who has made "searching the Scriptures" a ground for specific praise—and "feeding the lambs of His flock," the subject of a last and affecting command.

MORNING FIRST.

LESSON.—1st Samuel, Chapters xiii. and xiv.

Mama. Do you remember, Mary, with what striking and affecting incidents the final resignation of the aged prophet Samuel's delegated authority over the children of Israel, into the hands of the king they had foolishly desired, was attended?

MARY. Yes. First he defied any one to say he had wronged or oppressed him; and then God answered his prayer by sending rain and thunder at the time of wheat harvest, when, you told me, such things were hardly ever heard of.

MAMA. True; but did this alarming, and (had it been allowed to continue) seemingly vindictive exercise of the prophet's influence with Heaven, form the closing feature of his intercourse with the people he had, like his predecessor Moses, so long loved and borne with?

MARY. No, no. When they saw their error in asking a king, and besought his prayers, the good old man said, "God forbid he should ever cease to pray for them," and gave them the best advice, to "fear the Lord, and serve him in truth," if they would prosper, they and their king.

MAMA. We are now to see how, in the latter case especially, the advice was obeyed. How long had Saul borne that character when our present chapter (the 13th, 1st Samuel) commences?

MARY. I don't know, Mama. At first it says he "reigned one year," and in the same verse, that "he had reigned two."

MAMA. This has puzzled older heads than your's, Mary, and the most probable way of reconciling it is, that one year had elapsed from Saul's anointing, at the period of Samuel's public resignation in the last chapter; and two before the events recorded in the one we have just read, viz. the permanent establishment of his regular army, and dismissal of the residue to their homes and occupations.

What was the first exploit of the body thus selected, or "chosen" out of Israel, and under whom was it achieved?

MARY. Oh! Jonathan, Saul's son, good, kind, generous, Jonathan! One of the reasons, Mama, why I wished so much to read again about David, was to hear more of Jonathan. I always liked him so much, when I was quite a child, for not being jealous of David.

MAMA. True, Mary; bravery and generosity are qualities peculiarly calculated to win the affections of childhood; and in both, this amiable young man eminently excelled. Against whom was the former at this time directed?

MARY. The Philistines; the old enemies of Israel, we read so much of in Samuel's time. No wonder they hated the Israelites, since they had suffered so much from sickness for taking and keeping the ark! But why did Saul "blow a trumpet throughout the land, to let all the Hebrews hear it?"

MAMA. Probably to recall to his standard in this emergency, (for the Philistines, we read, were gathered like the sand on the sea shore,) some of the fighting men he had recently disbanded. The peril was indeed great. For though thirty thousand chariots is supposed by the best commentators to be an error for three, yet, when we consider what we formerly heard of the formidable and destructive character of these war chariots, by which men were mowed down in their ranks, like corn before the sickle—and when we remember that at the very time of this invasion the children of Israel did not possess a smith of their own, but were compelled to go to those very Philistine garrisons (one of which they so boldly attacked under Jonathan) to sharpen even their implements of husbandry-we shall cease to wonder that it was with "fear and trembling" these long oppressed bondmen obeyed the heroic summons of their king. Still less can we wonder at, or blame him, for feeling as if at this crisis the Divine protection and sanction alone could enable him to face his foes. But oh! Mary, few things in the Bible so strongly enforce on us all, the Almighty's decided preference of "obedience" over "sacrifice," as the signal displeasure of God at the invasion of the priestly functions by the seeming piety of Saul. The excuses for it, in human eyes, were cogent and numerous. The people, thoroughly disheartened, not only hid themselves in caves, and thickets. and rocks, but some of the more timid actually fled to their brethren beyond Jordan; and were (as Saul afterwards, to justify himself, declared) so "scattered from him" by gradual desertion. during the season when Samuel, like the great Power, whose minister he was, mysteriously "delayed his coming"—that human policy usurped with him the place of submissive obedience.

MARY. How sorry he must have felt, Mama, when he had done what was wrong in offering sacrifice, for just "as he had made an end of doing it, Samuel came!"

MAMA. Yes, Mary. The God whom Saul by his distrust had offended, sent, at his own "set time," the appointed minister of his will and service. And can we, even as finite creatures, wonder that the sinful impatience of the man he had raised from "seeking asses," to make him king over Israel, should have been rebuked by the ancient and ever faithful servant of God?

By what excuse did Saul (like our forefather Adam, and all his succeeding progeny) seek to palliate his infringement of the plain command of God, to "tarry for Samuel at Gilgal," and his assumption of the sacerdotal office?

MARY. He said he was afraid the Philistines would come upon him before he had made supplication to the Lord.

MAMA. Let us weigh this reason, my dear, not by its flimsy superficial appearance of piety, but in the just" balance of the sanctuary," by the unerring standard of the law of God. Could the enemies of Jehovah, whom, as such, he had so lately and signally humbled, attack his people but by his express permission? If so, why did Saul go through the mockery of invoking protection from Heaven at all? And if not, was this protection likely to be effectually purchased by a direct infringement of the Divine command? Or have we any instances, since the solemn institution of the Mosaic priesthood, of God's declaring that sacrifices might lawfully be offered by mere secular persons?

MARY. No! I remember even wicked Jeroboam saw it would not do to offer sacrifice himself, and so resolved to make priests to do it for him. And Micah, though he knew little of God, was delighted to get a Levite (such as he was) to be his priest, because he felt none else would be of any use. Even Saul knew that it was wrong, for he says, he "forced himself" to do it.

MAMA. That is to say, in plain language, he was goaded on, in defiance of his better judgment, by the mere human motives, (seemingly opposite, but not the less seldom found united in man,) of criminal distrust on the one hand, and presumptuous arrogance on the other.

How did the man of God, the "seer," whom long experience had taught to detest sophistry, and denounce sin, at once cut short the pretexts by which Saul had, till then, half succeeded in deceiving himself?

MARY. "Thou hast done foolishly."

MAMA. Terrible words! if we bear in mind, that in Scripture phraseology "folly" and "wick-edness" are strictly synonymous, that the "fool hath said in his heart, there is no God;" and that Saul, by not keeping his commandments, had (as we have often observed,) practically said the same thing; even while acknowledging him with his lips, and sacrificing on his altar.

By what denunciation was the honour and veracity of the Most High, very properly vindicated?

MARY. Saul's "kingdom was not to continue;" and "the Lord had sought him a man after his own heart," to be king instead of him.

MAMA. And for this apparent change in the (we know) immutable counsels of Jehovah, what is the express reason assigned?

MARY. "Because thou hast not kept that which the Lord commanded thee."

MAMA. These expressions, my dear, so characteristic of the leading deficiency in the conduct of Saul, would, if borne steadily in view, throw light on that striking feature in the public character of his successor, the reference to which, in his consequent designation of the "man after God's own heart," has so puzzled some, and scandalized others; and the perversion of which, to a sense never ntended by the sacred writer, has given rise to a general "wresting" of the whole history of a right-minded, but very fallible mortal, by scoffers, (" to their own and other's destruction,") as implying Divine connivance at, or even approbation of sin; and by pious persons, to the scarcely less dangerous error of palliating and glossing over the private transgressions of the supposed favourite of Heaven, by applying to them the discriminating praise, here simply awarded to his public zeal for, and obedience to the commands of the Lord. If you yourself, as you tell me, and indeed the youngest unsophisticated readers of the chequered biography of the shepherd king of Israel, are painfully struck with the discrepancy between the high encomium of our chapter, and the sad enormities which stained the private life of one thus enviably distinguished—we cannot wonder that, by the malignant comments of enemies to the Bible on the one hand, or the mistakes of injudicious friends on the other, the whole history of David has been converted into a "stumbling-block," or "rock of offence," which many, I believe, would almost wish removed altogether from the Christian's path.

But that it may not prove so to you, my dear child, I cannot better, perhaps, than now, at its very threshold, put you in possession of the only key to its difficulties, furnished by the labours of the hosts of able and excellent men, whose talents have been devoted to its elucidation. David. then, while in his hatred to idolatry, and zeal for the living God, he is justly held up as a contrast to disobedient Saul, and a pattern to future Jewish monarchs-may, in his private and far more imperfect character, be viewed as reflecting no less truly, the occasional lapses into gross sin, the humbling inconsistencies, but prevailing spirit of penitence and devotedness to God, which characterize the erring, yet sincere Christian. And sure I am, that none such can behold, reflected as in a mirror, his own easily besetting sins, in the less praiseworthy parts of this much abused chapter in the annals of human nature-without feeling inclined, instead of joining the scoffer in his sneer at the palpable blots in the picture rather to shrink abased in the comparison with the deep penitential fervour, and ardent renewed obedience, by which the falls of David were, on the first awakenings of conscience, immediately succeeded. And now that your age, and increasing acquaintance with spiritual things, leads me to hope that our joint consideration of it in this light, may be blessed to our mutual benefit,-I feel glad that your expressed wish on the subject overcame the perhaps sinful cowardice, which had made me half shrink from the discussion.

and leave you to grope your way unaided through a thorny, but most improveable field of moral discipline. We shall have abundant reason as we go along by comparing especially that precious treasury of the inmost sentiments of David, contained in his Psalms, with the circumstances in his external history which gave them birth—to be convinced that the interesting record was truly written, like other Scriptures, for "reproof, for example, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness."

We must now, however, pass to the victory granted by God to the not yet fully discarded monarch of Israel. By whose valour was it specially won?

MARY. Oh! Jonathan's to be sure. Only he and his armour-bearer ventured over into the midst of a whole army of Philistines.

MAMA. This sounds rash and presumptuous, Mary. What could have led them to expect success in so hazardous an attempt?

MARY. Jonathan said, perhaps the Lord would "work for them; and that it was all the same to Him, to save by many, or by few."

MAMA. So that, what would have otherwise been unjustifiable rashness, sprung from unbounded trust in God, and was recompensed accordingly. Such you know, was the spirit in which we shall by and bye see the youthful friend of Jonathan, go out "in the strength of his God," against the gigantic champion of the same Philistines. How did He who paralyzed before David the mighty arm of the giant of Gath, now blind the understanding, and "confound the devices of his people's enemies?"

MARY. The very sentries, who should have kept them out, invited Jonathan and his companion up; and he saw directly that it was God who had so infatuated them; and this made them as bold as lions, and able to kill twenty men.

MAMA. Yet they would probably, when the first surprize was over, have fallen victims to numbers, had not a strong "spirit of delusion" from the Lord, turned the fury of these Philistines against each other.

But by what singular and barbarous enactment did the brave young prince of Israel, narrowly escape losing his life?

MARY. Mama! it was something like Jephtha's vow, only not quite so bad. Saul had rashly sworn, that any one should die who tasted food till the sun was down; and Jonathan, who knew nothing of it, was faint, and glad to find some wild honey.

MAMA. Yes; we have another trait of the same impatient and precipitate character, which induced Saul to offer unbidden sacrifice,—in the attempt to secure uninterrupted carnage of his enemies, by the prohibition of halting for necessary food. Were he, or his people, really gainers by this arbitrary and unwise decree?

MARY. Oh! no; for if Jonathan's strength was so much revived by a little honey, all the rest would have fought twice as well, if they had not been faint for want of food.

MAMA. But what greater evil far, than even diminished slaughter of the Philistines,—accrued from the king's rash curse?

MARY. It made the poor famished Israelites fly on the sheep and oxen they took, and "eat them with the blood." Why was this so wrong that even Saul was shocked at it?

MAMA. You are, I am sure, sufficiently aware of what precious blood that of beasts, under the Jewish economy, was a type,—to know why it was required to be carefully shed, and never partaken of, even in the slaughter of animals for ordinary use. And it may afford a useful lesson of the degree in which the "letter" of a commandment may subsist, when its "spirit" has never been apprehended,—to learn that modern Jews among ourselves, still employ,—from scruples about "blood," only butchers of their own faith and nation; while its relation to the bloo which their sinful ancestors invoked on "themselves and their children," never dawns on their benighted minds.

But how did Saul,—on this occasion, so scrupulously alive to the sins of others,—nearly expiate his own fault in driving them to it?

Mary. Poor Jonathan's life was very near paying for it; and that I daresay was punishment enough to his father. But was he wrong in condemning his own son, since even God seemed to be angry with Israel on his account?

MAMA. It was Saul, we may believe, against whom the chastisement of the Lord, both in the denial of further conquest, and the jeopardy of his beloved son, was chiefly directed. And though, by the permitted interference of an indignant people, Jonathan was preserved to him, the danger to which his rash adjuration had exposed him, would no doubt prey on the fierce and gloomy temper, which, ever after his rejection from the favour of God, the unhappy king seems to have indulged. This, in the meantime, found vent (as we learn from the end of our chapter) in constant and active warfare, in which, as an instrument not yet wholly cast aside—God was pleased to use him, for the vindication of his own honour, and the relief of his people, from the "hands of them that spoiled them." That these wars continued all the days of Saul, was probably chiefly owing to that withdrawal of direct and supernatural aid, which, we shall see in our next chapter, his ingratitude and disobedience, so justly and fatally provoked.

Let us learn in the meantime, from those of to-day, the decided preference of "Him with whom we have to do," of obedience over empty professions, or even ritual observances; the jealousy with which He guards his own hallowed institutions; His power of working confusion to his enemies, by the most apparently inadequate means: the inconvenience, as well as sinfulness of rash oaths, and the applicability to all such of our Lord's injunction, "swear not at all." Let us apply also, in a spiritual sense, what is casually dropped of the continued and indecisive warfare, which distinguished the unquiet reign of Saul, when forsaken of God, and left to his own unassisted valour and ferocity. Thus it is with the unrenewed man, and his ever unsubdued spiritual enemies. Attacked in his own strength, or at times irresolutely connived at, they harass and embitter to its last hour, his brief and stormy pilgrimage; and of him it may be said, as of the restless perturbed career of the rejected tyrant of Israel, "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked."

MORNING SECOND.

LESSON.-1st Samuel, Chapters xv. and xvi.

Mama. In the first of these chapters, my dear Mary, we have the history of that fresh intrance of disobedience, by which Saul's threatened forfeiture of the kingdom, was, though still deferred, rendered final and irrevocable; and in the next, that anointing of his successor, which though as yet confined to the "secret counsel" of the Most High, was not the less a sure pledge of future sovereignty, to him on whom it was so wonderfully conferred.

What special and solemn injunction of the God he had so lately (and as he alleged) unwillingly offended,—did Saul now take upon him directly to question and disobey?

MARY. An awful one! to "smite Amalek," and "utterly destroy men, women, and children, and the very cattle!"

MAMA. Awful indeed, Mary! and a severity of Divine justice reserved (as we have already) seen in the case of the Canaanites) for the extreme of bardened and incorrigible wickedness alone. But what other reason, besides the "measure of the iniquities of Amalek being full," is assigned by Jehovah, as one more likely to actuate a Hebrew monarch, than even regard for the insulted majesty of the King of kings?

MARY. The "lying in wait" for Israel by the Amalekite on the way up from Egypt. Mama! I remember they would not give the children of Israel a passage through their country, nor so much as water to drink.——

MAMA. Nay, Mary, you are unconsciously mixing up, with the positively injurious conduct of the Amalekites, the cnurlishn is of the posterity of "Edom" or Esau. Nor, while blaming the latter, must we overlook the peculiar enormity of the repeated and unprovoked attacks of the former, on God's lately rescued people; by which his supremacy was defied, and his plans attempted to be frustrated at their very outset. It was, we may believe, more for resistance to the Divine will, than for simple enmity towards Israel, that Jehovah was induced to record "for a memorial in a book," the awful doom, "I will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven;" and that Moses, when erecting an altar in commemoration of the victory over that devoted people, expressly named it, "Jehovah-Nissi; because the Lord hath sworn, that he will have war with Amalek, from generation to generation." Both these inspired declarations being extant in the word of God, and the altar in all probability, still standing, you will now understand, that in seeking to make Him "a liar," by frustrating his declared purposes regarding Amalek—Saul became in reality, a sharer in that nation's original transgression, of resistance to the Livine decree.

This decree God had now, in his appointed time, determined to fulfil, and that by the hands of the warlike Jewish king; whose very elevation (wholly due, as Samuel reminds him, to the unmerited favour of the Lord) ought to have secured, from a grateful heart, the most unlimited obedince.

MARY. Yes, indeed. But there was some good about Saul too, for he remembered the Kenites' former kindness, and warned them to go away.

MAMA. And this part of his conduct, we may be sure, was not disapproved by Him, who, while never "extreme to mark what is done amiss," by the most faulty of his creatures, notes carefully, in the "book of his remembrance," the slightest benefit conferred on his chosen servants. By what deed of this kind had the Kenites earned the gratitude of Israel?

Many. Isuppose when Jack the wife of Heberthe Kenite, delivered them by killing Sisera. Though a cruel action for a woman, it was a great thing for Israel, and I suppose saved the lives of thousands of innocent people. I have understood that much better since we talked it over, and so I shall, I daresay, this about Agag. Indeed, I know already Saul had no right to spare his life, when God had forbidden him to save any one.

MAMA. And I do not know my dear, that any explanation could add to the force of what you have simply and unconsciously stated, as tothe exact cause of Saul's apparent clemency proving displeasing to God. But, besides the direct. contravention of a plain, but awfully expressed command, there were two features in the transaction peculiarly insulting to the Being whom Saul professed with his lips to honour and revere. The first was an arrogant assumption on the part. of his mere human instrument, of that power to absolve and punish, which belongs of right to him "in whose hands are the keys of hell and of death:" and the second was the insolent attempt to propitiate one who prefers "obedience" before "sacrifice," with an offering of the very spoils. which, as an abomination in his sight, he had devoted to utter destruction. "Shall man be more just than his Maker?" might indeed have been addressed, by the indignant prophet, to him who had "taken upon him to speak peace," when God himself had said there should be "no peace" even to the "wicked." And well might he, with reference to the second insulting mockery—have asked—"what meaneth this bleating of sheep and lowing of oxen in mine ears?" if indeed the "command of the Lord" had been implicitly performed?

MARY. Mama! I see it all. And I don't even think (as I once did) that it could be out of tender heartedness Saul saved Agag alive, because he was so ready, just before, to have put his own son to death, for innocently taking a little honey.

MAMA. Yes, Mary; so disproportionately did this capricious tyrant estimate a slight transgression against his own arbitrary decree, and a whole life of provocation against the Most High—that the same hand which scrupled not to sign, in the midst of his meritorious success, a brave and amiable son's death warrant, refused to execute on an inveterate foe, the just sentence of the Almighty! Pride, and self-will, Saul's two besetting sins, were, we may be sure, at the bottom of what passes, with the unthinking, for commendable humanity, in the reckless intended executioner of Jonathan, and the cowardly attempted assassin of David.

Did you remark any circumstance, as we read, by which the latter feature, a common attendant on wickedness, here displayed itself?

MARY. Yes, Mama; Saul basely lays the blame, of saving the oxen and chief things that should have been destroyed, on "the people," as if they would have dared, unless he had set them the example by sparing Agag.

MAMA. And what signal confirmation did the prophet soon give to the awful words, that "rebellion is in the sight of the Lord as the sin of witchcraft, and stubbornness as idolatry?"

MARY. When Saul was meanly clinging to Samuel to turn again with him, not because he was sorry, but merely that the people might not know God had given him up—the prophet's mantle was rent, and Samuel told him it was a sign of his kingdom being taken from him, and given to a better person.

MAMA. What is the special reason assigned for this final rejection of Saul from being king over Israel?

MARY. Because he had "rejected the word of the Lord."

MAMA. And to what awful sanctions does the prophet appeal for the irrevocable nature of the doom?

MARY. "The strength of Israel," he says, "will not lie nor repent, for he is not a man that he should repent."

MAMA. As we may henceforth consider Saul—though temporarily, for the trial of David's faith, continued on the throne—as judicially dead, and given up to that worst of avengers, his own "reprobate mind," us be sure that we fully understand and adequately appreciate those unpardonable offences against the benefactor by whom he had been raised, which justified, even to our finite judgment, the withdrawal of God's abused favour. In what one word may they be summed up?

MARY. Disobedience, Mama.

MAMA. And is this the first instance of forfeiture, deep, grievous, and irrevocable, brought on man by the same unhallowed cause?

MARY. Oh! no. Adam and Eve lost paradise for disobeying God like Saul.

MAMA. And, like Saul, for distrusting him; the bitter root of all disobedience, being then, as now, unbelief. "We shall not surely die," echoed our parents' heart to the voice of the tempter. "Surely the bitterness of death is past," thought the wretched Agag, at the moment when his deserved doom was about to come upon him, aggravated by the vain-glorious respite of Saul!

MARY. One cannot help being a little sorry for Agag, and vexed that Samuel should have to be his executioner.

MAMA. On the former point, I think you may be relieved by what is said here and elsewhere of the personal cruelty of the Amalekite tyrant, which rendered his death an act of just retribution. And as to the atter, Samuel is never supposed to have taken on himself an office, inconsistent with the sanctity of the priestly character, but merely to have sanctioned and presided at the judicial execution of Agag.

There cannot, perhaps, be a stronger contrast between genuine and spurious sensibility, the which you yourself remarked, of the reluctance of bloody Saul to sacrifice God's enemy, and the unhesitating readiness to do so of the gentle, mild Samuel; whose whole character—from his almost infant sympathy with the wounded feelings, and family misfortunes of his aged benefactor, to his own pathetic farewell address to his ungrateful, but still beloved countrymen—breathes nothing throughout but tenderness and benevolence.

Of this we even see a trait in his compliance with Saul's abject intreaties that he would turn with him, to save appearances, before the elders of his people. And though duty to a higher sovereign, forbade the aged prophet ever again to renew their personal intercourse; we read that he "mourned" in secret for the worse than death of the goodly youth, in whose exaltation (even at the expense of his own) he had been so disinter, ested an agent.

MARY. It shewed a very good heart, I am sure, and one is sorry that God seems displeased by it.

Mama. Nay, Mary; the gentle rebuke, implied, rather than contained, in the beginning of our second chapter, hardly bears that construction; any more than the many similar ones addressed to good Moses in like occasions.

But did the one prophet, any more than the other, testify at first, the required alacrity in God's service?

MARY. No; Moses, you remember, made many excuses not to go to Pharach; and Samuel said if Saul heard of his going to anoint another king, he would kill him. How could he be so foolish?

MAMA. Just because he was a man, Mary, and not an angel; and to shew that the most tried servants of God—those who could confront, in his strength, at one time, the power of a Saul, or a Pharaoh—could give way, at others, to a despondency and distrust, not altogether strangers to the more enlightened Christian's path.

But how wonderful and encouraging, in both instances we have quoted—is the long-suffering, and condescension to human infirmity, of the Almighty! Moses has miracle after miracle vouchsafed, to overcome his reluctance; and Samuel is permitted to cloak, under the vail of sacrifice, the sinful cowardice of a treacherous heart—thus, indeed, unconsciously furthering, by his own weakness, the probable designs of providence, in keeping secret for a time, the future elevation of a son of Jesse.

Of what town was this man an inhabitant?

MARY. Bethlehem, Mama! the very place where Christ was born!

MAMA. And does this surprise you, my dear? Of whom was his mother, a lineal descendant?

MARY. I might have known-of David.

MAMA. And do you remember how this birth of the Saviour of mankind, was, in fulfilment of ancient prophecy, brought to happen at Bethlehem, where his parents had never resided?

MARY. By his mother going to her own city to be taxed. . . .

MAMA. Yes; in obedience to an edict of a heathen emperor, unique, as far as we know.

in the annals of his empire, and of which we should probably never have heard, but for its unconscious furtherance of the recorded designs of Heaven!

But to return to Samuel and his mission. What effect had it on the elders of Bethlehem?

MARY. They "trembled," and asked if he came "peaceably." What were they afraid of?

MAMA. Probably of rebuke for some transgression of which their consciences accused them, nor could the recent public reproof and rejection of Saul, have failed to invest with additional awe the character of God's chosen prophet. But he soon quieted these fears, and offered along with them that sacrifice, without which (though not so understood by them,) the inauguration of the future king would have been unhallowed and incomplete.

With a view to their particular share in it, Jesse and his sons were specially "called" and "sanctified;" being indeed, as we elsewhere learn, among the principal persons of the city. But were they all present on the solemn occasion?

MARY. Oh no! Mama. I used to be so delighted long ago, when I first heard the story—with Samuel fancying that all the handsome elder sons must be God's choice—and dear little David all the while left with the sheep, and nobody so much as thinking of him!

Mama. Nobody! Mary! He who "seeth not as man seeth," thought of him, and had marked him, even "from the sheepfold," for his own. Not for the beauty of his countenance,—though he too, like his brothers, was "goodly to look at,"—but because the Lord, who "looketh on the heart," discerned there, the fairer rudiments of faith and obedience, of piety and penitence. For these it was, that he said to his servant Samuel, "Arise, anoint him, for this is he." And how wonderful is the consequence of this mystical act, and how great is henceforward the contrast, between the now rejected, and chosen future, king of Israel! Wherein did it consist?

MARY. The Spirit of the Lord came upon David, from that day forth,—and departed from Saul.

MAMA. And was this desertion of God's Spirit, —awful and desolating as it must have been, his only punishment?

MARY. Oh no! "An evil spirit troubled him;" but why is it said to be "from the Lord?"

MAMA. Because permitted at least, by the Almighty, to combine with his own remorse, and ungoverned passions, judicially to vex and torment him, like the demoniacs we read of in Scripture.

But how singular was the providential arrangement which brought—at the unconscious suggestion of Saul's survants—to his court, the successor, whose presence there, and popularity with the people he was one day to rule over, were as desirable, as under ordinary circumstances, they would have been improbable.

For what purpose was David summoned from keeping his sheep, to be the unexpected inmate of a palace?

MARY. To play before Saul on the harp, and charm away his melancholy. I wonder how a shepherd boy should have become a famous musician, and be heard of so far.

MAMA. Music, in its simplest forms at least, is no unusual shepherd accomplishment. But from David's being styled, at this early period, "a mighty valiant man and prudent," as well as a comely person, we may trace in the lately obscure and forgotten stripling, the maturing energy of that Spirit of the Lord, to whose presence even Saul's servants ascribed such uncommon qualifications.

MARY. How strange too, that Saul should have taken a liking to the very person he would have hated, had he known all! This must have been God's doing, as well as the effect of David's playing, in charming away the evil spirit.

MAMA. That the whole course of events which placed David under the immediate shadow of the throne he was hereafter to occupy, was overruled by God, is too manifest to escape any one. But music,—such especially, as the pious strains, with which we are sure the sweet psalmist of Israel must have soothed the unquiet and remorseful spirit of Saul, has a powerful tendency of itself to calm and tranquillize the soul; independently of the direct rebuke which the piety of David, "severe in youthful beauty," would convey to an actual spirit of evil, were such permitted really to visit and harass Saul.

Of his taste and proficiency, even thus early, in sacred poetry, we have an example in the 9th Psalm, supposed by many to be commemorative of the victory over Goliath. And Oh! Mary, when reading it, and the many other delightful productions of the same inspired pen, can we ever be sufficiently thankful, that the songs of Zion, which had power in those days, to banish the gloom, and refresh the troubled spirit of Saul, have descended through countless ages, to cheer, and fortify, and animate the Christian of our own,—to attend him as familiar friends, through every step of his chequered pilgrimage—to lull his very cradle with their hallowed melodies—to form the first precious exercise of his infant lips, and memory—and, gladden his dying ear in that dark valley, which they have so powerfully contributed to divest of its terrors.

MORNING THIRD.

LESSON.-Ist Samuel, Chapter xvii.

Mama. The peculiar energy and animation, my dear Mary, with which, (as I remember remarking in the case of your favourite Ruth) you have just read me the history of the first exploit of the youthful David, seems to spare me the trouble of pointing out its uncommonly interesting character. But the scene of it, so minutely here described, will be placed, perhaps, more vividly before your eyes, or your imagination, if we quote, in illustration of it, some remarks of a modern traveller of that valuable class; to whom we are of late years so deeply indebted, for making the localities of our sacred story familiar to the fireside of the humblest Christian reader.

He says:—"After some miles of hard journey over hills and rocks, we entered the famous valley, renowned for centuries, as the field of the victory gained by David over the uncircumcised Philistine. Nothing has occurred to alter the face of the country. The very 'brook,' whence David chose the 'five small stones,' has been noticed by many a thirsty pilgrim, journeying from Jaffa to Jerusalem, all of whom must pass it in their way. The ruins of goodly edifices, attest indeed, the religious veneration entertained in later periods, for the hallowed spot; but even these are now scarcely discernible; and nothing can be said to interrupt the native dignity of this memorable scene."

MARY. How I should like to see the very spot! Whereabouts shall I look for it on the map?

MAMA. The places named in the beginning of the chapter, as the site of the combat, lie between Jerusalem and Bethlehem; to the south of the former, and somewhat nearer to it, than to the latter; viz. a distance of from fifteen to twenty miles.

But was this memorable valley between "Shoah and Azekah," destined to be the scene of a general battle between the two great armies, which occupied the rival heights on either side?

MARY. No, no. The Philistines thought one of their men enough, to conquer the Israelites by; and sent him out to challenge any one of them to fight him; and whichever champion lost, his nation was to serve the other.

MAMA. Similar trials of strength in ancient days were not uncommon; and sometimes humanely designed to save needless effusion of blood. But was the contest, in this case, an equal, or fair one?

MARY. Any thing but that! Goliath was a giant, more than six cubits high, and all covered with brazen armour.

MAMA. But unless we know the precise height to which six cubits and a half amount; or what proportion the weight of this huge and cumbrous armour, bore to the structure of the Philistine giant, we shall form a very imperfect estimate, either of the terrors of this gigantic champion, or the courage of David in encountering him.

MARY. Mama, I forget about a "cubit," though you once told me.

MAMA. It is the length of a man's arm, from the shoulder to the elbow; and thus measured, Goliath must have stood, nearly eleven feet high. Indeed, a less bulk could hardly have sufficed, to enable him to bear the enormous burden of his armour, which weighed, even by the standard of the smaller shekel, must have amounted to an hundred and fifty pounds; his spear's head alone, weighing from fifteen to twenty.

We need not wonder that such a Colossus, thus provided with defensive, as well as offensive armour, (for his very legs were shielded by "greaves of brass,") should strike terror among the nearly unarmed multitudes of Israel; accustomed for years to tremble before the Philistines, and but recently emancipated from their galling yoke. Saul too, had lost, with God's favour and countenance, his youthful valour and daring; and day after day, did the blaspheming pagan insult with impunity, the name and people of Jehovah.

But by what train of circumstances, was David brought opportunely to the camp, to vindicate the honour of both?

MARY. I was rather going to ask, how he came to be away from it, and seemingly living at home with his father. I thought he was already at court, waiting on Saul.

MAMA. I am glad you have observed, and mentioned, what has puzzled older heads to 'account for satisfactorily.

Some have been induced, (especially by the apparent ignorance of David's person, displayed by Saul's questions about him, after the victory,) to make this part of his history precede in the order of time, his appointment as minstrel to the deceased monarch; while others again think the questions might simply apply, to the particular family and parentage, of the "stripling" now rendered famous in Israel.

We should always be extremely cautious in adopting conjectures, however plausible, when not borne out by the express words of Scripture. But as similar inversions of the order of events, are by no means uncommon, as we shall see, in this very history, where their rectification, so far from invalidating, only corroborates the truth of the sacred narrative—I can see no possible harm in leaning (in a point of no material consequence,) to the former, and most probable of the two opinions, or stating the grounds on which it rests.

In the first place then, had David, as is certainly said in this hapter even resigned, on the army's taking the field, his post of "armour bearer," to Sead, and returned (a most unlikely circumstance) to the care of what his brother tauntingly calls, "his few sheep in the wilderness," that brother could hardly have dared to upbraid with presumption, in desiring to witness the battle, one already in favour at the court of Saul. Indeed, the whole effect of the simple wonder, and innate modesty, yet transcendent bravery, and noble trust in God, of the youthful champion, is so heightened by supposing him (as the narrative itself almost implies) arriving, for the first time in his life, on a scene of conflict, as a simple rustic messenger to his warlike brethren-and fresh from his sylvan triumphs, in the strength of his God, over the beasts of the desert—that it would quite mar the beautiful simplicity of the picture, to fancy him already a resident in a court, and an associate of Saul, and his "men of war." Nor is there the least difficulty, in supposing that the later circumstance, of David's soothing with his music, the melanchilv of Saul, was mentioned, naturally enough, by anticipation, in last capter; as connected with the recorded departur of God's Spirit from the one, and the gifts conferred by its descent on the bid of the other. That the selection of David for future sovereignty, was as yet unknown to, or distrested in his family, we have a proof, in three of his ... thers being engaged in the army of Saul.

On what errand, connected with their comfort, was their future monarch dispatched to the camp?

MARY. He was sent, just like Joseph, to see after their welfare, and carry their provisions. And his brother puts me in mind of Joseph's brethren, he is so cross and envious.

MAMA. Yes; and it is singular, that much as we hear minutely, and by name, in after days, of David's chief friends and adherents, few of his father's numerous family (the sons of his sister Zeruiah excepted) occur among them, as sharers either in his evil or prosperous fortunes. But did the evident neglect by which, as a youth, he was treated by his overbearing relatives, make him hesitate to obey his father's command for their benefit?

MARY. Oh, no! he "rose up early," and when he came to the place, he "ran into the army and saluted his brother." And just as he was talking to them, the giant came up, as usual, with his arrogant words, and David heard him.

MAMA. And what effect had the insolent defiance, and the aspect of its utterer (before which "all the men of Israel fled, and were sore afraid,") on the shepherd boy of Bethlehem?

MARY. He longed to fight him from the first, one may easily see, though he was too young and modest to say so.

MAMA. And does it appear to be for the sake of the "great riches" promised, or even the hand of the king's daughter, that his generous soul burns to be the instrument in this great victory?

MARY. No; it is to be the man to take away the reproach "from Israel," and punish the "uncircumcised Philistine" who dared to defy the armies of the "living God."

MAMA. Yes, Mary; such was the flame of mingled piety and patriotism that kindled in a moment the latent valour of David, and earned for him the supernatural aid of Him, for whose insulted majesty he chiefly felt indignant! Yet, with all this high resolve, and righteous confidence beating proudly in his heart, could David gain a nobler victory over himself; and disarm, by the "soft answer that turneth away wrath," the malignant sarcasms of his brother.

How did he reply to him?

Mary. "What have I done? is there not a cause?"

MAMA. Or, in other words, "Can you wonder at even a youth, feeling prompted to avenge his country, when among so many older, and abler champions, none seems willing to undertake it?"

But all did not treat his generous purpose with the haughty contempt of Eliab; his words were repeated to Saul, and he sent for him.

MARY. Mama! if Saul had known him well before, he would surely have said so now; but he speaks to him like a stranger lad, and says he is not able to go against the Philistine.

MAMA. A most natural conclusion, humanly speaking, and judging merely from their relative age, size, and strength. But in what a beautiful manner does David remove the pardonable distrust of the king! Perhaps a more exquisite example of genuine modesty, and true piety, is hardly to be found in the Bible, than is contained in these few verses. And had the dispositions thus early indicated, remained uncorrupted by the evil influence of the world, the title of one "after God's own heart," might have adhered to David, unquestioned, through life.

Read me the words of this simplest and sweetest of heroic narratives.

Mary. "Thy servant kept his father's sheep, and there came a lion and a bear, and took a lamb out of the flock. And I went out after him, and smote him, and delivered it out of his mouth; and when he arose against me, I caught him by the beard, and smote him, and slew him. Thy servant slew both the lion and the bear; and this uncircumcised Philistine shall be as one of them; seeing he hath defied the armies of the living God.

"David said, moreover, the Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear; he will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine. And Saul said unto David, Go, and the Lord be with thee."

MAMA. Yes, Mary; to faith and holy confidence such as this, human prudence itself would offer no further opposition. Nor could, let us remember, such pure and sublime sentiments owe their origin, save to that "Spirit of the Lord" by which we already are aware, the soul of the young man was now fully possessed and inspired.

MARY. Then the Spirit of the Lord "resting" on David, means, I suppose, something very different from the way it used to "come" at times upon Samson?

MAMA. I am glad you have recollected and applied this; and discerned the distinction, between the infusion from on high, of pure spiritual principles, and holy motives, in the whole character (with a few sad exceptions) of David—and the mere conveyance of supernatural bodily strength and energy, for special purposes, to the generally faulty Samson.

But by what purely natural means did Saul design to compensate for the tender age, and inexperience in war, of David?

MARY. By lending him his own armour: but the lad had never been used to it, and felt it would only be an encumbrance. I can well understand this, Mama, for I tried to lift a coat of mail in a museum once, and I could not so much as move it with both hands.

MAMA. Imagine, then, what practice would be necessary to wear a whole suit of such ponderous materials. But with what weapons, more adapted to his age and calling, did the shepherd champion of Israel provide himself?

MARY. "Five smooth stones out of the brook," and a bag, and his sling and staff. No wonder, Mama, that the proud Philistine was affronted, and asked if he came out against him as a dog.

Mama. Or that he, who saw only "as man seeth," disdained the fair ruddy countenance, and simple shepherd-bearing of the Lord's anointed! But was he satisfied with bare contempt and scorn?

MARY. No; he "cursed David by his gods," and said he would "give his flesh to the fowls of the air, and the beasts of the field."

MAMA. And did David, as youthful rashness might have dictated, return "cursing for cursing," and "railing for railing?"

MARY. No, indeed! his answer is both mild and awful. "Thou comest to me with a sword, and with a spear, and with a shield; but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of Hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast defied."

MAMA. Ay, Mary, and while he retorts in the name of that God, the insolent threats of the enemy and blasphemer—mark the noble pervading motive which, on this and a thousand subsequent occasions, animated the courage of this lion-hearted servant of Jehovah, viz. "that all the earth may know that there is a God in Israel," and that "he saveth not with sword and spear, for the battle is the Lord's, and he will give you into our hands."

Bear this in mind, my dear, as that grand leading principle, by which the extent of God's reciprocal favour for his faithful servant, is, even to our finite understanding, fully justified.

MARY. It does one's heart good to hear so young a person speak so beautifully, as well as boldly. No wonder his hand was steady, and his aim good, and the stone sent right into the giant's forehead! It must have been hard work to draw out the huge monster's sword, and cut off his head with it? Why did David do this?

MAMA. In compliance with universal custom, and to bear the trophy to the feet of Saul. The valuable armour which the same custom made the property of the conqueror, was afterwards piously dedicated, along with the sword, by David in the tabernacle of the Lord; thus giving the honour of the victory to whom all honour was due, and proving that the expressions by which it was ushered in, viz. "the battle is the Lord's," were not, as is too often the case in similar references by carthly conquerors, mere lip homage, and words of course.

We have commented so fully, as we went along, on this pleasing and well known part of Scripture, that we have only to draw from it the personal and practical encouragement it affords, for strenuous resistance, in the strength of our God, of our spiritual enemies. For it were to insult that Lord, whom David delighted to honour, to imagine, that he who restrained before his youthful anointed, the ferocity of the wild beasts of the desert-and made a pebble in the hands of a boy, the instrument of discomfiture against a mail-clad giant-will fail, in the hour of nced, to fight on the side of those who display in his service, the humility, the zeal, and, above all, the fervent piety, and deep sense of religion, of David.

MORNING FOURTH.

LESSON.-1st Samuel, Chapters xviii. and xix.

MARY. Mama, I am quite at a loss now, which to love best, David or his friend. I almost think Jonathan is most to be admired, because it would have been, so natural for Saul's son to hate and envy David, especially when the women present him in their songs above his own father; instead of which, he preferred him to his very self!

MAMA. I should indeed have been disappointed, my dear child, had this disinterestedness of attachment, so peculiarly attractive to youth, failed to secure your esteem for Jonathan; and I anticipate much pleasure, as well as instruction, from our following up together the progress of a friendship so honourable to both parties, as well as to our common nature. How early did it commence?

MARY. At once, Mama. There is not a word said here about their knowing each other before; but no sooner had David done speaking to Saul, than "Jonathan loved him as his own soul."

MAMA. And well does an affection, so nobly founded, deserve to be traced to higher motives than mere caprice or fancy! On what subject was the conference between Saul and David, by which the favour of Jonathan was so instantaneously won?

MARY. About the victory over the giant, I suppose; they could be talking of nothing else.

Mama. And what qualities, far beyond mere animal bravery, or even mental heroism, did David's former speech to Saul, on the same occasion, manifest?

MARY. A delightful mixture, Mama, of modesty, as a lad—and yet boldness to fight because God would be with him—and concern for God's honour—and feeling for his poor countrymen—and a great deal more besides.

MAMA. And can we wonder that qualities so rare in themselves, and still more rarely united—should command the esteem of a thoroughly kindred mind? or that, combined with the happiest personal gifts in one of congenial age and disposition—they should ripen quickly into indissoluble attachment? How was the reality of this affection first proved?

MARY. By Jonathan "making a covenant with David," and stripping off his very "robe," and "sword," and "girdle," to give him.

MAMA. Are you aware that by all these actions, more than simple good-will was intended, and demonstrated? In the east, the bestowal of a royal "robe," or pelisse, on an inferior, is, to this day, one of the highest marks of distinction. Do you happen to recollect any instance in which an individual, suddenly raised from the depths of peril and obscurity, was similarly invested?

MARY. Let me think, Mama! I don't know if a "robe" is mentioned, but Joseph had fine clothes put on him by Pharaoh, and a ring off the king's own finger.

MAMA. We'll remembered. But I was thinking of "Mordecai, the Jew," who—as the "man whom the king delighted to honour,"—was led through the city, arrayed in the royal robes, and mounted on the king's own charger.

An exchange of "girdles" has ever been, in those countries, a token of unbounded confidence; and to none but a braver (at least in his own estimation) than himself, would a warrior of antiquity have presented his sword, or bow.

But did David justify the high, and almost romantic estimate formed of him by his princely comrade?

MARY. Yes. He "behaved himself wisely, and was accepted in the sight of all the people, and of Saul's servants also."

MAMA. In the latter part of this praise, Mary, we have an almost certain confirmation of its earlier portion. For "wisely" indeed must that obscure youth have "behaved himself," who could, at the age of two-and-twenty, have sustained undazzled, the exaltation of being "set over" the valiant warriors of Saul; and at the same time secured their esteem, and that of the nation at large?

In what rather invidious manner was this esteem manifested?

MARY. The women came "out of all the cities of Israel," singing, to meet Saul; but all the time praising David ten times more highly.

Mama. A circumstance too likely to aggravate and embitter the already envious feelings of Saul towards his youthful protégé. But did the women of Israel, in thus celebrating the triumph of their monarch, and his young lieutenant, over the natural enemies of their country, violate (as we should now feel to be the case) the customs or decorum of their sex?

Many. I suppose not, Mama; for Miriam, you know, did the same, after the Red Sea; and Deborah composed a famous hymn about the battle with Sisera.

MAMA. Right; and with such examples, the conduct of the "daughters of Israel" was fully warranted. But in what light did it appear to Saul?

MARY. He was "very wroth, and the saying displeased him," and he said, "what can he have more, but the kingdom?"

MAMA. Ay, Mary, in the fear of being supplanted in it, lay the secret motive of all Saul's unhallowed jealousies and apprehensions! And whence had these their birth, but in that desolating sense of abandonment by God, which his own stubborn disobedience had provoked? Well may our great poet say, that "conscience doth make cowards of us all!" for what are the words of inspiration to the same effect, regarding Saul?

MARY. "Saul was afraid of David, because the Lord was with him, and was departed from Saul."

MAMA. And under the influence of these "terrors from the Lord," the unhappy monarch was driven to forego the soothing effects of David's minstrelsy; and place him in an office of trust at a distance from his person.

What reason have we to think this arrangement a providential one for David?

MARY. Because, Mama, Saul must have grown madder and wickeder than ever; for he actually tried to kill David with a javelin, while he was playing to do him good.

Mama. If you had reversed your remark, and said, "wickeder and madder," you would have come nearer the truth. For, observe, this accession of the judicial frenzy of Saul came on him, just after his heart became possessed with enhanced envy and evil passions against the innocent David.

MARY. But how came he to "prophesy," in such a sad unholy state of mind? What can the word mean here?

Mama. Some think the word should be translated (as the original admits) so as to express the "howlings" of ungoverned frenzy; others, who interpret it literally, suppose the "prophecy" to have consisted (like the extorted testimony of the demoniacs in the New Testament) in involuntary predictions of the exaltation of his rival. Be this as it may, the "reprobate mind" to which he was now "given up," was not long in suggesting a frightfully treacherous device, for getting rid of his supposed enemy, under the mask of honour and friendship.

What reward had been promised to him who should deliver Israel from the Philistine champion?

MARY. "The king's daughter in marriage."
But Saul never thought of fulfilling it, till it occurred to him it might perhaps be the means of getting David killed in battle.

MAMA. And did David fall lightly into the "snare" so cruelly laid for him?

MARY. No; he does not seem at all anxious to be the king's son-in-law; and twice declined the honour. Indeed, the first time, Saul could not be serious in it, for he gave Merab away soon after to another person.

MAMA. And, after such a gross affront—when the partiality of the king's second daughter for David, induced her father to repeat the treacherous offer of her hand—was it idle ambition that moved him at length, with much modest reluctance, to accept it?

MAR1. No, Mama; it was his bravery, and love of fighting with God's enemies. For whenever he was told his marrying Michal depended on his killing a hundred Philistines, "it pleased him well to be the king's son-in-law;" though all the time Saul only intended to get him killed by them.

MAMA. And was such the result of his cruel and cowardly project, to murder his benefactor, and make a widow in heart of his favourite child?

MARY. Oh! no. David killed double the number of Philistines, and then Saul was ashamed not to "give him his daughter to wife." But instead of being glad, he seemed to grudge that she should love him.

MAMA. Yes, Mary, even the happiness of his child, with an estimable husband, had become a source of disquiet to one, who was now, in spite of this near relationship, "his enemy continually."

But did any indiscretion on David's part lend a shadow of motive to this unnatural hostility?

MARY. Not one. He "behaved himself more wisely than all the servants of Saul; so that his name was much set by."

MAMA. Oh! Mary; what an humbling commentary on these words of deserved encomium, is supplied by the opening verse of the very next chapter, "Saul spake to Jonathan, and all his servants, that they should kill David!"

Does this remind you of a still more hateful and groundless persecution of a greater than David—merely because he did "all things well," and "grew in favour with God and man?"

MARY. Oh, yes. The scribes and pharisees were like wicked Saul—mad with rage and envy—always laying snares to catch Christ—and "taking counsel together how they might kill him." But our Lord had no friend like Jonathan to give him warning of their plans.

MAMA. You forget that the same Divine interposition so often exerted to extricate David from present danger, for future sovereignty—was expressly and mercifully withheld, to promote the sacrifice of Christ. "Think you," (had it been otherwise,) His "Father could not have sent twelve legions of angels" for his rescue, instead of a frail human instrument?

But how was that of David, from the "snares of the fowler," (as he himself pathetically calls them,) effected?

MARY. Good Jonathan first warned him to keep out of harm's way—and then spoke boldly and beautifully for him to his father.

MAMA Beautifully indeed! and not the less boldly, that the discretion which ever accompanies true courage, induced him to confine his defence, exactly to those points which might soften, without irritating Saul. Had he urged, for instance, that David always "behaved himself wisely," and was in consequence, the darling of Israel,—would he have acted the part of a judicious, as well as sincere friend?

MARY. No. Saul's jealous mind would have taken fire, and he would have hated him more. But now he "hearkened to the voice of Jonathan, and swore 'as the Lord liveth,' he shall not be slain."

Mama. And what a victory,—a bloodless but glorious triumph was this for a son to achieve,—by his own justice and moderation, over the heart of a cruel parent, and in behalf of a more than brother! Who would not envy his feelings, as he once more beheld the two objects dearest to him, brought together, as in times past, by his powerful mediation?

But was this happy state of things of long duration?

Many. No, no! David gained another great battle; and directly Saul's "evil spirit" came upon him. It must surely have been the devil himself, Mama; for we never hear of it, except just when he gets envious of David, and then it immediately makes Saul try to kill him.

MAMA. All characteristic traits no doubt, of him, who we know is a "murderer from the beginning;" and to whose machinations Saul's mind was laid sadly open, by the declared departure of the Holy Spirit. Be this as it may, to what domestic guardian (placed about him, we may remark, by his very foe himself) was David indebted, under Providence, for safety?

MARY. When Saul sent after him to his own daughter's house, to watch for and murder him,—she let him down by a window; and dressed up an image in the bed, and said he was sick.

MAMA. And did the account of his son-in-law's illness, at all disarm or mollify the rage of his cruel father?

MARY. No; he sent, for him, bed and all, that he might slay him; and when he found out the trick, was angry with his very wife for saving him.

MAMA. Truly might David say, in the affecting 59th Psalm, composed in this imminent peril,— "Deliver me from the workers of iniquity, and save me from bloody men.

"For, lo! they lie in wait for my soul; the mighty are gathered against me; not for my transgression, nor for my sin, O Lord.

"They un and prepare themselves without my fault; awake to help me, and behold."

Nor could any simile more appropriately convey the idea of the relentless ferocity with which his dwelling was beset by the emissaries of Saul, than that of a pack of hungry and howling dogs, disappointed of their destined prey.

"They return at evening—they make a noise like a dog—and go round about the city."

"Let them wander up and down for meatand grudge if they be not satisfied.

"But I will sing aloud of thy power—yea, I will sing aloud of thy mercy in the morning."

With whom did David take refuge, or, as he glsewhere expresses it,—" flee as a bird unto the mountain?"

MARY. With old Samuel at Ramah.—One might have thought Saul would have had respect for him.

MAMA. Especially, as still farther to ensure the safety of David, the aged prophet went down and lived with him at Naioth, within the hallowed precincts of the college, or school of the prophets.

What befel the sacrilegious messengers, sent by Saul to invade this sanctuary?

MARY. When they saw the company of the prophets, and Samuel at their head, they fell a prophesying too. Does this mean foretelling what was to come, or in giving praises to God?

Mama. The latter, in all probability; as this was the stated employment of numbers of holy persons, who never pretended to the strictly prophetic office. But if the inspired songs in which the messengers joined, were expressive, as is likely, of the faith and trust of David, in his Almighty deliverer, the extorted homage of those who involuntarily echoed them, would be the more evidently miraculous; especially in the case of the infuriated monarch himself, who went down, (enraged at the ill success of his mission) to wreak his own vengeance on David.

What a contrast must have been afforded, between his quickly stifled imprecations, and those holier strains of praise, which (from such "unblest lips,") came so strangely and fearfully on the ear of his hearers, as to give rise to the proverbial expression of surprise,—" Is Saul also among the prophets?"

Does this remind you of any namesake of his, who, bent on an exterminating mission, and "breathing out threatenings and slaughter," was suddenly transformed, by a gracious remonstrance from on High, into an inspired follower of the meek and lowly Jesus?

MARY. You must mean the apostle Paul,—though he was never so wicked as Saul, for he thought he was doing right all the time, when he persecuted the Christians.

MAMA. True; but it was the spirit of persecution originally in him, (however directed) to which I alluded,—and the complete subjugation of which, by the power of Christian principle, was a miracle, transcending far-the brief transformation, from a blasphemer to a prophet, of the impenitent king of Israel.

For it is his continued impenitence, Mary, that supplies, (instead of a continuation of the parallel,) a final and deplorable contrast, between the fate of Saul of Gibeah, and Saul of Tarsus.

Had the former, (like the latter,) "not disobedient unto the heavenly vision," improved to its possible gracious end, the miraculous interference of the often quenched Spirit of God, in his destructive purpose-and become, under its hallowed influence, reconciled in sincerity to David -what a store of temporal peace, at least, if not of prosperity, might have been laid up for his declining years; in the filial love of the best of sons, co-operating with the fidelity of the bravest of sons-in-law, for the protection of his throne, and stability of his kingdom! Instead of a baffled murderer, he might have remained to the day of his death, a mighty and honoured monarch. And his death, instead of being self-inflicted, at the suggestion of despair-and a fit termination, for a life of malicious ungodlinessmight have been as peaceful, as the forbearance of that long-suffering God-who granted earthly tranquillity, as the meed of the tardy penitence of an Ahab-could make it.

Let us remember the question of Saul of Tarsus, himself; "Who made" those " to differ," so widely in their end, who in some features of natural character, so strongly resembled each other? And let us ever pray, that we may never provoke God to withdraw his Holy Spirit from us; and by so doing, choose our own portion with the unreclaimed and impenitent monarch of Israel.

MORNING FIFTH.

LESSON-Ist Samuel, Chapters xx. and xxi.

MARY Mama! was it not a little rash and foolish in David, to come back from Naioth, where he was safe with good Samuel, and put himself again in the power of Saul?

Mama. And does not your wonder at his taking so natural a step, my dear, betray a little haste, and want of consideration on your part, both of David's situation and character? Not to mention the irksomeness of being a fugitive, and an exile, to every man of common feeling and patriotism, David had left behind him, at the court of Saul, a faithful wife, and an honourable employment. There lay the scene of his domestic enjoyments, and public duties; and whereever these centre, there will the heart of the truly "excellent of the earth," ever fondly turn, at the hazard of suffering, of danger, nay even of death itself.

But you forget the firm faith, and unswerving trust of David, (which a residence under the roof of holy Samuel, could scarcely have failed to strengthen) so beautifully expressed in the 11th Psalm, supposed to have been composed, when first advised to provide for his safety by flight.

"In the Lord put I my trust; how say ye to my soul, 'Flee as a bird to your mountain?"

Descriptive indeed, of the treachery of Saul, are the words:

"For lo, the wicked bend their bow, they make ready their arrow upon the string, that they may privily shoot at the upright in heart."

But what is the holy influence that, amid such perils, sustains and reassures David?

"The Lord's throne is in heaven; his eyes behold, his cyclids try the children of men. The Lord trieth the righteous; but the wicked, and him that loveth violence, his soul hateth."

With such a persuasion as this, for the prevailing habit of his soul, you will no longer wonder, I am sure, that David should return to his home and duty; especially with the additional human motive, supplied to him by the powerful countenance of Jonathan.

MARY. No, Mama; and I am not surprised that Jonathan was too good himself to believe that Saul would kill David, after his oath. But David seems to have known his enemy better.

MAMA. Yes, Mary; by bitter experience of his repeated machinations! Did even Jonathan, after his friend's expressed conviction of them, advise him at once to shew himself to Saul?

MARY. No; he agreed, like a true friend, to do for David, "all that his soul desired," and find out if he could appear safely. But why should he have "sat at meat" with the king, at the "new moon?"

MAMA. Because a solemn feast, accompanied by a sacrifice, was appointed to take place on every such occasion; and of course Saul, (who had not left off the outward semblance of religion) would expect his household to be present. Are you aware, that the months of the Jews (by which all their festivals were regulated) did not begin, like ours, on the same particular day every year; but on the first appearance of the new moon itself, which persons stationed for the purpose, on the tops of hills, proclaimed by the sound of a horn, to all the country?

MARY. Ah! this explains something about "blowing the trumpet for the new moon," which I remember I did not understand when I met with it. How pleasant it is, Mama, to know by degrees, what every word in the Bible signifies!

MANUE And how pleasanter far, Mary, as well as more profitable, to be learning to apply,—as I trust you begin to do—the little, the meaning of which is become clear to you, to the purposes for which all "Holy Scripture is given," of "reproof, of doctrine, of correction, and instruction in righteousness!" Even the mention of abolished ritual observances,—such as the Jewish "new moons,"—may thus be made to remind us of the radical defects in sacredness and sincerity, by which they were at length converted into an abomination, in the sight of Him who ordained them.

But what test was the solemnity of the "new moon," to furnish of David's safety from Saul?

MARY. Jonathan was to let him know whether the king enquired for him roughly, or kindly. But it was a pity David should bid him say, he was "gone to Bethlehem," if the king missed him,—unless he really went.

MAMA. Let us hope that he did so Mary, as a natural visit to his father's family, on returning from exile, and one quite easy of accomplishment within the three days which elapsed, before his friend and he again met. And how inconsistent with the utterance, or even implication of falsehood, is the manly confidence in his integrity, with which he expresses his readiness, if really guilty of aught against his sovereign, to fall by the hand of his princely brother in arms!

MARY. How beautiful it is, Mama, to see Jonathan take David and the fields, where none heard but God, and call God to witness his kind intentions toward him!

MAMA. And how much more admirable still, the heroic submission to the Divine decree, and unparalleled disinterestedness of personal friendship, which could lead the heir-apparent to the throne of Israel,-without one murmur against God, or trace of jealousy of his innocent rival,not only to pledge his own soul to continued good offices towards him: but to condescend to invoke in return, the future good-will and protection of the shepherd boy, to whom God had seen meet to hand over his hereditary sceptre! In vain would you search, my dear child, in all your ancient histories, for a state of mind so superior to the common weakness of humanity; and to what, save the knowledge and fear of the true God, can we attribute this unquestioned superiority in magnanimity, of an obscure Jewish prince, over the greatest heroes of pagan antiquity?

MARY. Oh! there are none of them to be compared with Jonathan. They never dreamed of making friends of those who were to reign instead of them.

MAMA. Nay, Mary; the very possibility of persons 'reigning' not 'instead,' but after them, affords a criminal pretent to many an eastern monarch, (even among those who profess to worship the one true God) for depriving of eye-sight, and frequently of life, their own nearest relations; and so it was unquestionably in Fonathan's power to have acted at this moment towards David, instead of counting his safety more precious to him than his own.

To what, besides native greatness of soul, and the power of religion, are we to ascribe this rare preference?

MARY. To Jonathan "loving David as his own soul!" I hope David loved him again, as he deserved.

MAMA. That we shall have full occasion to praise, both from his grief at the death of his friend, and his well-earned kindness to that friend's helpless offspring.

But by what expedient was Jonathan, without suspicion, or danger to either, and without a personal interview, to apprize David of the result of the banquet at the "new moon?"

MARY. By shooting three arrows, near where David should be hid; and according as he should say to the lad with him, "the arrows are on this side," or "beyond thee," David would know it was safe to stay or go. He might almost have guessed beforehand (as I did) how Saul would behave. But what did he mean by thinking, the first day he missed David, that he might be "unclean."

MAMA. You were aware, I thought, that certain legal defilements,—for instance, touching a dead body, or attending a funeral, disqualified the Israelities for partaking in religious "solemn assemblies," by which name, "new moons" you know, are called in Scripture.

MARY. But how could Saul wonder at all, at David's absence? Did he think he would come, and have a spear thrown at him again?

MAMA. He might be excused for thinking so, as the thing had already happened twice; and David's forgiving disposition could not be unknown to him. But let us mark the bitterness and contempt, displayed even in the disparaging epithet, of "son of Jesse," by which he designates his own son in-law,—suggested perhaps, by that excuse of the recent family festival at Bethlehem, which, whether true or fictitious, would have proved equally unavailing with Saul—whose rage, at what he conceives his son's blind infatuation, now for the first time, betrays its secret motive; in the knowledge of David's future sovereignty over Israel.

That the narrow and selfish spirit of Saul, should be incapable of comprehending or appreciating, the generosity of his son, is only what might be expected. But in his unnatural effort to murder that son, instead of his intended victim,—we see the blind ferocity of a soul, emancipated from Divine restraints, in the most awful and humiliating light. Twice has this unoffending, nay, praiseworthy son, nearly fallen by his parent's rash hand; once for bravely defending, and now for yet more honourably abdicating, his father's forfeited kingdom.

MARY. Well might Jonathan know, that when Saul had tried even to kill him, it must be all over with David; and no wonder he was angry, and left the table directly.

MAMA. I'rue; but have you observed for whom the grief was experienced, which embittered to this noble youth, the royal banquet, and turned its viands into gall? Was it for his own narrow escape from death, or the opprobrious epithets lavished on him by his father?

MARY. No; "he was grieved for David," and the shame done to him by Saul. Of course he lost no time in shooting the arrows far enough, to let him know all was at an end. But after all, David and he did meet, and speak together.

MAMA. So it happened, though the great uncertainty and danger, attendant on such an interview, rendered it prudent to have concerted other means of communication. But oh! Mary, what reason have we to be glad, that the affecting meeting was permitted to take place; as it affords perhaps, the most delightful picture of mutual affection and fidelity, which the annals of the world can supply!

I see you feel it, as all must do; and I trust you are capable of appreciating and admiring the exquisite simplicity (unequalled save in holy writ) with which the heart-rending parting scene is narrated—the deep and repeated reverence of David's gesture, called forth, not by a difference of rank, which each had long since forgotten-but the spontaneous homage of one generous soul to the kindred greatness of another; and the transition from this, to the fond endearments of a friendship, truly said, to "surpass the love of woman" -and the weeping of those who felt (like the apostle and his converts) that they might "see each other's face no more"-and the solemn benediction, and consignment, to the protection of Jehovah, of him who was about to go forth, not knowing (like his great descendant) where to " lay his head!"

On these, my dear child, it is needless, worse than needless to enlarge. The simple words of the sacred historian make us see, nay, feel it all; and those who never felt disposed to weep with David at the feet of Jonathan, and Joseph on the neck of his brethren, and Jesus at the tomb of Lazarus, may safely defy the power of language to wake emotions of tenderness in their stony bosoms.

But while we rejoice in the possession of more human sympathies—let us not be content with admiring, and loving, nay, feeling for David and Jonathan. Let us endeavour to regulate our human friendships by so bright and engaging an example; selecting our favourite associates among the chosen children of God,—for conformity to his will, and devotion to his service,—viewing with holy conclusion, rather than envy, their superior adv. I tages of nature or of grace—adhering to them faithfully, through good and evil fortune—and consigning them, when torn from us, to the keeping of him "whose favour is life," and to that "friend who sticketh closer than a brother."

Were Christian friendships thus solidly founded, and faithfully conducted—we should hear less of broken ties, and disappointed expectations; and after cheering each others' path through life with a continued interchange of "sweet counsel"—denied, alas! to David and Jonathan—those who, like them, had been "lovely in their lives," would even in "death" be for ever "undivided."

But we must follow the future king of Israel's wanderings through the land, one day to be his own.

To whose protection did he now betake himself?

MARY. Last time he went to Samuel, and still he seems to have preferred good men; for he came to Nob, to Ahimelech the high priest. Mama! I thought the high priest lived always at Jerusalem, where the ark was.

MAMA. You must have thought less than usual, my dear, and little to the purpose, since you could forget that Jerusalem continued a city of the heathen Jebusites, till conquered long after by David; and since the late migrations and present fate of the ark of God, could have escaped your memory.

MARY. Oh! I ought to have remembered about the ark being sent back from the Philistines' country, in a cart drawn by two milch cows; who found the way into Judea of themselves. But I quite forget at what place it remained till now.

MAMA. At Kirjath-jearim, whither it was removed, after the judgment which fell on the men of Bethshemesh, for profaning its sanctity. Here it remained forty-six years; till brought up in triumph by David, as we shall hereafter see,

But why not earlier transferred from its obscure exile to the wonted shelter of the tabernacle, we have no means of ascertaining. This only we know, that Nob, the city at which Ahimelech was officiating, was one set apart for the residence of the priests, and as such, in some degree sacred. There is something extremely puzzling, and (as far as I know) hitherto unexplained, in the circumstance of "shew-bread" being daily consecrated and offered, in the absence of that "ark of the testimony," and "mercy seat," before which it had been originally ordained to stand. That it was so, we learn, however, from our chapter.

What were the first emotions of Ahimelech, on seeing David?

MARY. He was afraid, when he saw him "alone"—why so?

MAMA. Because, as the trusted commander of a large body of men, it was unusual for him to be so meanly attended; though (having, as we see, "young men" with him,) he could not be literally "alone." You are shocked, I am sure, at the falsehood by which David attempts to account for the scanty number of his followers, and represents himself as still in the employment of Saul. The only palliation of which it admits, is the evident desire of David, not so much to escape suspicion himself, as to screen (by keeping him in ignorance of his disgrace,) the venerable servant of God from the future vengeance of Saul. In this we shall see he failed, (as dissemblers so often do,) in consequence of the presence of a spy, a wretched Edomite, named "Doeg," by whom the hospitality of the priest to a supposed confidential relation of the king, was grossly and cruelly misrepresented.

MARY. But had Ahimelech a right to give any one, except the priests, the hallowed bread to eat?

MAMA. Strictly speaking, certainly not. But, according to our Lord's merciful interpretation of many Mosaic precepts, charity to the famishing, might be held to supersede mere legal disqualification; especially, as the marginal translation explains, that fresh bread was already consecrated, and ready to replace that which might, by being withdrawn, become in some degree "common."

But what want did David labour under, more serious in his present exposed condition, than even a temperary famine of bread?

MARY. He had no "sword," or other weapon. I suppose, Mama, he durst not go to his own house to get one, before he came away, for fear of Saul. But how glad he must have been, that he had piously hung up before God the giant Goliath's, when it came now to hand in his own extremity! Well might he say, "there is none like that!" and now that he had grown older and stronger, he could bear its weight with ease. But, Mama, could Achish, the king to whom David fled for shelter, live at that very "Gath" to which Goliath belonged? If so it seemed madness to go to him.

MAMA. What rational hope of protection David could have from a Philistine monarch, it is difficult to imagine; at all events we cannot wonder that to suffered severely, for what was certainly an unhallowed, and must have been an injudicious choice.

MARY. Mama; he must surely have trusted to their not knowing who he was—but they did; and then David (I feel quite ashamed of him) feigned himself mad. Why did he do this?

MAMA. Evidently that the distrust which his former fame as a warrior would have inspired, might be counteracted by pity for his supposed condition. But the artifice was despicable in itself, and utterly unworthy of one, who had lately declined flight, even from certain peril, from the lofty consciousness that the "Lord careth for the rightcous," and would "save all who put their trust in him."

But lest our just disapprobation of unworthy expedients, should render us insensible to the greatness of the extremity (incurred however by his own folly) to which poor David was at this time driven, let us turn to the 56th Psalm, composed on the occasion, and see what sense of utter desolation and hopeless persecution it breathes. By what strong figures does he express the rage and fierceness of his enemies?

MARY. He says they would "daily swallow him up"—"Every day they wrest my words, all their thoughts are against me for evil.

"They gather themselves together, they hide themselves, they mark my steps, when they wait for my soul."

But he says, at the same time,

"In God have I put my trust; I will not fear what man can do unto me."

If this had been true, he need not have pretended madness; but prayed to God to help him out of his distress.

MAMA. Nay, he did at length, as we learn from this beautiful Psalm, commend his cause to him, whom he thus pathetically invokes,

"Thou tellest my wanderings; put my tears in thy bottle; are they not written in thy book?"

"When I cry unto thee, then shall mine enemies turn back; this I know for God is for me."

Happy had it been for David's reputation, as well as comfort, had such pious sentiments been always uppermost in his mind! And happy will it be for every Christian, who adopts, as the motto of his warfare with sin and Satan, the same motives to fervent prayer, and holy confidence. For every redeemed sinner may, with even stricter propriety, appropriate the concluding words of the Psalmist,

"Thou hast delivered my soul from death; wilt thou not deliver my feet from falling; that I may walk before God in the light of the living?"

MORNING SIXTH.

LESSON-1st Samuel, Chapters xxii and xxiii.

MAMA. I think it will assist us in rightly estimating the greatness of the escape which David lately made from the enraged townsmen of Goliath—and his own deep sense of it—if we turn to the 34th Psalm, in which, while in comparative safety in the cave of Adullam, he poured forth his gratitude to his almighty defender.

How does this beautiful hymn of praise commence?

MARY. "I will bless the Lord at all 'times; his praise shall continually be in my mouth."

MAMA. Yes; and observe how he urges to unite in his thanksgivings, those companions in affliction, whom relationship by blood, or similarity of condition, had driven to join him in his exile.

"O magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt his name together."

And how beautifully does he encourage them to depend for protection and sustenance on the same omnipotent hand!

"O taste and see that the Lord is good; blessed is the man that trusteth in him."

"The young lions do lack and suffer hunger; but those that seek the Lord shall not want any good thing." And, lastly,

"The Lord redeemeth the soul of his servants; and none of them that trust in him shall be desolate."

Indeed, the whole Psalm might be quoted as one noble effusion of pious confidence, and over-flowing gratuate; and cannot be read (especially when viewed in connection with the affecting circumstances under which it was written,) without corresponding emotion.

What little band of fugitives in the desert was it specially designed to cheer and animate?

MARY. His "brethren, and all his father's house" had come to him; I suppose they feared Saul would kill them next. But it was a pity, I think, Mama, that "discontented" people, (as well as those in "debt" and "distress,") should join one who was of so different a temper.

MAMA. Perhaps the marginal translation, viz. "bitter of soul," will better express the legitimate workings of a "wounded spirit," which might cause those to abandon home and country, who (like David) were strangers to the mean vice of discontent. He has been charged with setting up, for fraudulent debtors, and political malcontents, a standard of rebellion against Saul; an accusation which his own conduct, even when that bitterest of enemies was actually in his power-utterly belies. That one, himself unjustly proscribed and exiled, should open his arms and asylum to similar sufferers, was only natural. But his four hundred associates, so far from being of advantage for enabling him (had he been so disposed) to engage in any treasonable enterprize-seem by their inefficient numbers, to have been incompatible with his personal safety. The cave, and its desert vicinity, must soon have ceased to afford subsistence for so large a company; and we find it dispersed accordingly,first by David soliciting a refuge for his parents with the king of Moab; and then (on private warning from the prophet Gad) seeking an asylum for himself with his kinsmen of the tribe of Judah. Mama! why did he not take his . MARY. parents there; rather than to the heathen king of Moab?

MAMA. In the first place, Mary, such frequent removals, from a desert cave, to a distant forest, as the perilous condition of David obliged him to make, at a moment's warning—must have been very unsuitable to the advanced age of a father and mother, whose youngest by far of seven sons, had attained to the age of 25. And, in addition to the probability held out by the king of Moab's variance with Saul, that he would afford protection to outlaws from his kingdom,—careful searchers of Scripture have discovered a special tie, between the nation thus applied to, and the family of David. Can you discover any?

MARY. Let me think a little. Did you not once tell me Ruth the Moabitess, was great-grandmother. David? I suppose that is what you mean.

MAMA. Exactly. Obed, the father of Jesse, was Ruth's son. And if, as the Jews assert, she was allied to the royal family of Moab, there were persons still living, by whom the connexion might have been remembered. That it was acknowledged, so far as the desired protection went—we learn from our chapter; and the safety of his aged parents (a consequence, you will observe, of the dutifulness towards her's of Ruth) must have greatly lightened the anxieties of David.

MARY. How curious this is, Mama; and how much obliged we are to the people who find it all out for us! I never should have dreamed of Ruth's having anything to do with David's parents.

MAMA. And whose fault would this have been, my dear; since you read, and talked over, and that lately—her precise relationship to him? But the task of patient research by which such severed links of sacred history are connected for our benefit, is indeed a praiseworthy one; tending to make what is in itself so useful—attractive and entertaining also.

MARY. I think we must apply to it again, to clear up the next verse, Mama; for the chapter says, Saul was both living in "Gibeah" and "under a tree at Ramah;" and you know Ramah, was where Samuel lived, a good way off.

MAMA. I am glad you observed this seeming discrepancy; and glad, also, that I can remove it, with the aid alone of that invaluable commentary which the marginal reading of our Bible affords. The word "Ramah" means, it seems, a "grove in a high place," and thus it ought to be understood here; and not as signifying a town of that name,—the one of which (for there were two) distinguished as the birth-place of Samuel, and since called Arimathea,—being at a considerable distance from Gibeah, and in the territory of Ephraim.

To what tribe of his own immediate kindred, does Saul, from his elevated position, address his indignant complaints against his supposed enemies?

MARY. He says, "Hear now ye Benjamites!" and he call. David thrice over, the "son of Jesse," to shew his contempt for him,—and accuses them, (Jonathan and all) of conspiring against him. One can hardly help pitying poor old Saul, when he says, no one is "sorry for him."

MAMA. But was there the least shadow either of truth or probability in his allegations, that his servants, nay is own son, had leagued against him, with a stranger of another tribe,—and that Jonathan had "stirred up David," and David "lain in wait" for him? Or were they not altogether the suggestions of the evil spirit by whom he was judicially tormented, or of his own yet more malignant temper?

MARY. Oh! yes; but that very thing makes one pity him more—he must have been so very unhappy!

MAMA. Not more unhappy than he deserved; as we shall presently see. But who was found, to minister by his ready falsehood, to the evil passions of his misguided master?

MARY. That wretch "Doeg the Edomite;"

and he told all about good Ahimelech giving David victuals and a sword in his distress.

MAMA. So far he told truth, though not all the truth; for he concealed the good priest's ignorance of David's disgrace with Saul. But in adding, that he "inquired of the Lord for him," (or in other words, sanctioned his supposed revolt,) he told a base lie; which involved in destruction an innocent man, and his whole connexions. Had Saul indeed not been bereft by frantic prejudice, of all power of discrimination between truth and falsehood,-how conclusive of innocence would have seemed to him the calm astonishment of the venerable man, that displeasure should have attended his honorable entertainment of the king's distinguished son-in-law! That such a solemn disclaimer by God's high priest, not only of evil intentions himself,-but suspicion of aught amiss in the character or conduct of David,-should have only provoked the murder of himself and family,-proves, that to the blind ferocity of a merciless tyrant, Saul now added open contempt for the altar of the Most High.

MARY. Mama! his soldiers were less wicked than their master; for they durst not "put forth their hand to kill the priests of the Lord." But Doeg fell upon them at once; and slew "eightyfive persons that wore a linen ephod." MAMA. Yes; thus supporting, by reckless and unhesitating cruelty, the slanders to which his malice had given birth. So true is it, that "sin" (even in a temporal and restricted sense) "when it hath conceived, bringeth forth death."

But, Mary, while deploring this dreadful and unmerited catastrophe, which involved in one common ruin, the "men and women, children and sucklings,"—nay, unconscious animals of the city of Nob,—has any light been thrown by it, on the mysterious counsels of God?

MARY. Ves, Mama. I could not help thinking of Saul's paring the Amalekites, and now, coolly butchering so many innocent people. Well might God, who knew it all beforehand,—be doubly angry with his pretences to humanity!

MAMA. I am glad you were struck with this fresh inconsistency between Saul's false lenity, and real thirst for blood. But the fact to which I wish to call your attention, is the unconscious fulfilment, by a tyrant and blasphemer, of one of the most striking predictions in Holy Writ.

Do you know from whom Ahimelech, and the whole wretched people involved in his ruin, were descended?

MARY. No, Mama.

Mama. To whom (as we read of late) was it foretold, by the innocent lips of a child, that God had decreed the destruction of his whole posterity?

MARY. Oh! you mean poor old Eli! and these priests, I suppose, were his descendants. How wonderful, that Saul, without knowing it, should be doing God's work! They did not all die, however,—one escaped to David.

MAMA. Yes; and how truly did this fugitive scion of a lately flourishing stock-realize the precise words of the prediction, that any who survived of the sons of Eli, should petition to be put into a priest's office for a "piece of bread,"when he, in whom the whole honours and dignity of the order now centered-was fain to secure a harassed and toilsome existence, by joining a persecuted exile in the desert, far from the tabernacle and altar, which furnished his appointed means of subsistence. Nay, there is, I find, (on turning to the prophecy,) a still more curious specialty in its wording, viz. "he that is left of thine house," (indicating the survivor to be one only,) " shall come and crouch to mine Anointed;" ' by which an eye witness could not have more accurately described the fleeing of Abiathar, to take refuge with David.

That on hearing of the massacre, David should at once have ascribed it to the well-known treachery of Doeg—will less surprize us, if we turn to the picture of his character in the 52d Psalm; (drawn apparently before the consummation of his meditated villainy,) where we find him thus apostrophized.

"Why boastest thou thyself in mischief, O mighty man?

"Thy tongue deviseth mischiefs, like a sharp razor, working deceitfully.

"Thou lovest evil more than good, and lying rather than to speak righteousness.

"Thou lovest all devouring words, O thou false tongue."

To which I wild prophetically adds,

"God shall likewise destroy thee for ever; he shall take thee away, and pluck thee out of thy dwelling place; and out of the land of the living."

But, Mary, we have left unnoticed one remarkable feature in this horrible transaction, viz. that by the escape of Abiathar to David, with the Ephod, or priestly garment, (in which we know to have been included the oracular breast-plate, containing the "Urim and Thummim,") the visible departure of God from Saul, was, by his own act, for ever consummated; and that very power of "inquiring of the Lord," or securing the priestly sanction to his enterprizes—the supposed exercise of which by David had so incensed Saul—was daily put within his reach. And oh!

Mary, now may indeed the condition of the wretched monarch of Israel, move our compassion! Doubly finally abandoned of the Most High,-"without hope and without God in the world,"-a prey to his own fierce passions, and given over-even without the temporary solace of the harp he had so foully silenced-to me anticipated torments of the "worm that never dies!" Let us, while shuddering over the picture, consider it as one drawn by an unerrang hand, to shew us the havoe and ruin in which the simple withdrand of restraining grace, can involve the human character. And let us remember, with wholesome awe, that the sins by which that grace was forfeited, -disobedience -self-will - and presumption-are yet among the commonest to which human nature is prone.

MARY. Mama, we see at once in our next chapter, the advantage of David having the ephod to enquire by; for God encouraged him to go and save Keilah, when all his men were afraid to go.

MAMA. And have you thought on how noble an enterprize the blessing of Heaven was thus invoked and obtained? one which at once gave the lie to all accusations of unpatriotic conduct or feelings in David. Would a person, really conspiring against his king and country, have risked his life to defend a city, from the very enemies, with whom he was said to be "in league?"

MARY. No; but that base ingratitude, both in Saul, and the men of Keilah! Saul hoped to catch David, in the very town he had rescued; and its cowardly men would have given him up! What a real mercy the cohod was to him now.

Mama. Yes, Mary; and why? Because David resorted on every emergency, in docile faith, to its uncreing decision. Had it similarly profited Scod, think you—by whom, while in his possession, it had been for years unconsulted and despised? It ow not that Scripture affords us a more striking contrast between the improvement or neglect of the means of grace, than is afforded by the practice of Saul and David. In the hands of the one, the mysterious breastplate of Aaron slumbers, a mere useless ornament; transferred to the other, it becomes at once the "lively oracle of God," and the daily rule of conduct to its happy and docile pupil.

MARY. No wonder, Mama, that, while he behaved thus—when Saul sought his life, "God delivered him not into his hand." But how glad I am to find that David and Jonathan met once more in this world.

MAMA. Yes; and how characteristic and delightful was the interview! The son of David's bitterest foe, "strengthening his hand in God," looking forward with a calm hope, (which, alas! he did not live to realize) of seeing his friend on the throne of Israel, and himself content to occupy a secondary station,-and ratifying in this full conviction, their former "covenant before the Lord." Well may we challenge all antiquity for a parallel picture, either of friendship or disinterestedness! Nor is it undesignedly said, in the beautiful simplicity of Scripture, that "David abode in the wood, and Jonathan went to his house." Jonathan was too good a son, and too loyal a subject, to offend, by open countenance of David, even his father's groundless prejudices; in which, however, by living apart from the court, he abstained from seeming participation.

One is at a loss at times, which most to admire,—the generous friendship, or consummate prudence, of this perhaps most perfect of Scripture characters !

MARY. The "Ziphites" seem to have been base tale-bearers, like Doeg, for they offered to betray David to Saul.

MAMA. Well might he say of both, in the 54th Psalm, composed on this occasion: "Strangers are risen against me, and oppressors seek after my soul. They have not set God before them." But with pious gratitude he was enabled to add, when the special providence of God had diverted the proposed attack upon him, into another quarter; "Behold God is mine helper; the Lord is with them that uphold my soul. For he hath deliver done out of my trouble; and mine eye hath seen his desire upon mine enemies."

How was this unexpected deliverance accomplished?

MARY. A messenger came to tell Saul, that the Philistines had invaded the land; and he was forced to return from pursuing after David. I daresay God put it into their hearts to invade Israel at that time, just to deliver David.

MAMA. :. h I vivine interpositions are by no means uncommon, in Holy Writ, and such a one David seems here to acknowledge, when he says in overflowing gratitude, "I will freely sacrifice to Thee. I will praise thy name, O Lord, for it is good."

And, so many are the unseen providences and deliverances, daily occurring in the path of the Christian—that this song of thanksgiving may at all times be echoed from the depths of a grateful heart; remembering only, while it is uttered, on the same high authority, that the only legitimate "sacrifices" of God, are a "broken and contrite spirit:" and that to be able to praise God acceptably with David, we must first have invoked him in our need, and obeyed him in our conduct.

MORNING SEVENTH.

LESSON.-Ist Samuel, Chapters xxiv. and xxvi.

MAMA. I have made you read in connexion, the two chapters separated from each other, by the episode of David's adventure with Nabalboth to allow us to consider in all its bearings, that remarkable incident, and still more, to combine within the small compass in which they really occurred, the two affecting instances of generosity, manifested by David, and the flagrant ingratitude with which they were twice (in spite of temporary protestations) utterly forgotten by Saul. We might again appeal in vain to the records of pagan antiquity, for deeds of such pure disinterestedness, as the fear of God, and respect for his anointed king, seem to have rendered easy to the generous nature of David; while the reckless perfidy, and blood-thirstiness, with which they were requited, can only be attributed to the direct suggestions of that "evil one," who we know, was a "liar" as well as "murderer from the beginning."

Where did the first of these affecting encounters between one, who at this time represents himself, as a "bird in the net of the fowler," and his implacable persecutor, take place?

MARY. In the "strongholds of Engedi,"—does that mean a fortress?

Mama. No, truly; for none such existed in the "wilderness," whither Saul had gone, "to seek David and his men, among the rocks of the wild goats." But how wonderfully were the relative positions of the "bird" and "fowler" reversed—when Providence sent Saul to take his noon-day repose, in the very cave in which David and his men were already concealed!

MARY. Mama, how could they both be there, without seeing each other?

MAMA. Very easily, from the great size, and extensive ramifications of the caves in Palestine; in one of which, a traveller tells us, he had himself been, capable of separately harbouring two bodies of men, more numerous than those of Saul or David.

MARY. It was no wonder that David's men thought the time was come for killing Saul! Most people would have taken him prisoner at least, to keep him from doing more mischief.

MAMA. You forget, Mary, that you are speaking of a monarch, still reigning, by the forbcarance, if not express appointment of Jehovah,— and consequently invested, in the eyes of right thinking persons, with an awful sanctity; which made David's heart smite him, for having even yielded to the pardonable temptation of cutting off a portion of the royal robe. Why did he do this?

MARY. Oh! that Saul might really believe he had been in his power. But Mama! how could David be so bold (even after letting Saul escape) as to call him, and talk to him,—he was so treacherous?

MAMA. He was, Mary; but even repeated experience fails to shake the trust of a generous disposition, in the better qualities of our common nature; and for once, David calculated rightly in supposing, that his more than filial submission and devotedness, must conquer, at least, for a time, the inveterate enmity of Saul. Hard, indeed, and unnatural must have been the soul of him, who could retain his ferocity, while beholding one so lately master of his life and kingdom,—prostrate on the earth before him, and accosting him by no title less respectful, than that of "my lord, the king!"

How convincing too, how irresistible were the arguments David could now allege to confute his enemies,—with the skirt of the robe of him, (whom he still duteously calls "father,") yet in his hand--while its owner stood uninjured in the presence of one, who had every human inducement, and the fairest opportunity, to kill him. If we add to its irrefragable truth, the dignified prity of David's address to Saul, and reference of their quarrel to the decision of the Almighty,-the touching humility with which he seeks to disarm resentment, by representing himself as the most contemptible of beings, unworthy the hostility of so mighty a monarch-(and all this set before us in the inimitable language of Scripture)—can we wonder that even Saul, under ...mporary emotion, "lifted up his voice and wer," and made to his rival the hardwrung confession, "Thou art more righteous than T ?"

MARY. He might well say that, Mama! I am sure he would not have spared David; indeed, he says, "If a man find his enemy, will he let him go well away?"

MAMA. But what a still more glorious triumph—undimmed too, by a single circumstance of alloy—did David obtain, when his subdued foe, (unable himself to reward such generosity) actually prayed the Lord to bless his enemy for it! Except, perhaps, the distinct acknowledgment, now for the first time extorted from Saul, of David's testined sovereignty,—nothing could more strongly mark the resistless, though alas! short-lived, supremacy of virtue.

How do you suppose this conviction had been at length reluctantly forced upon Saul?

MARY. I think David's noble behaviour, Mama, must have made him see there was something more about him than a common man; and that God was "surely with him."

MAMA. Exactly. Such truly royal magnanimity could only have found a place, in the breast of one, confident in the immutability of God's promises, and content to wait the time appointed by him for their fulfilment. But imagine, Mary, how deep must have been that sense of humiliation, which could make the proud king of Israel stipulate with his acknowledged successor, for the safety of his "seed," and the preservation of his "name in his father's house!" Surely the feelings of the moment, in which David, with ready generosity, took upon him the office of protector to the posterity of his deadly foe-must have outweighed all the puny gratification, which a few months or years earlier possession of that enemy's kingdom, could have conferred on a more ambitious character! And who under the influence of such feelings, would not have preferred accompanying David to his desert cavern, rather than Saul to his joyless, and unblest palace?

Unblest indeed it must have proved—for how soon do we find him once more the implacable pursuer of David?

MARY. I don't know, Mama. Did the chapter we have left out about Nabal, come between?

Mama. Certainly not; for the events it records were connected with the time of the death of Samuel; and if we suppose, with the Jews, that he died only four months before Saul, they must have happened long subsequent to the second encounter between him and David. If again, as is more generally believed, the death of Samuel project definat of the king, by two full years—the sheep shearing of Nabal must have taken place before the first meeting in the cave of Engedi. At all events, a period, incredibly short, clapsed before we find the unhappy monarch once more, as David pathetically expresses it, hunting for his life "as a partridge in the mountains."

At whose base suggestion was this black expedition undertaken?

MARY. The "Ziphites" came a second time to betray David. What could have made them hate him so?

MAMA. The motive for their animosity is not mentioned; but a natural one may have arisen, in the possible exactions of some of his lawless and distressed followers—whose scanty subsistence, in a barren wilderness, could scarcely have been procured without plunder and rapine.

Did David at first believe that Saul was really "come out against him?"

MARY. Oh no; not till his spies returned, would he believe "he was come, in very deed." Then he went and saw it with his own eyes.

MAMA. He must have taken advantage of one of the rocky eminences with which the place abounded, to be able to descry so minutely, the disposition of the enemy's army, and precise situation of the king's tent. But indeed that, in an eastern camp, is always in the centre, with the warriors around, at a respectful distance; their horses tied, ready for action, and their lances stuck by them in the ground.

MARY. How terribly bold it was of David and his friend, to go alone into the midst of so many soldiers, all with their weapons just at hand!

MAMA. It was so; but the security inspired by their superior numbers (3000 chosen men of Israel being around their king,) seemed to have banished all idea of a surprise, and dispensed with the customary precaution of placing sentinels. Do you know who the dauntless individual was, who voluntered to attend David in his bold enterprise; though apparently incited to it by very different feelings and motives?

MARY. It calls him the "brother of Joab," and "son of Zeruiah." I know Joab was a cruel man, and this seems to have been one too. But who was Zeraiah?

MAMA. The sister of David; whose sons, on that account, not only enjoyed a large share of his favour, but took upon them, on many occasions, very unwarrantable heense.

What office was Abishai now more than willing to assun:

MARY. A bloody one; he knew David himself would not kill Saul, and had no scruple in doing it for him. I half wonder David did not let him.

Mama. Would the sin of having been concerned in the slaughter of God's anointed, have been at all shifted from David's shoulders, by the paltry device of conniving at its execution by another? a cowardice and treachery quite unworthy of, and inconsistent with his character? No—not even the plausible suggestion that God had expressly delivered his enemy into his hand—would induce him to usurp God's legitimate office of avenger of "such as put their trust in him." And prophetic indeed were the chastened expressions, with which David rebukes the vindictive spirit of his associate! "The Lord shall smite him; his day shall come to die; he shall descend into battle and perish."

With what trophics of his daring and successful exploit, did David content himself?

MARY. The "spear, and cruse of water at Saul's bolster." His spear, I suppose, was stuck in by him like the rest—but why was there a pitcher of water?

MAMA. The heat of the nights, as well as days, in the east, sufficiently accounts for such a refreshment being placed within the reach of the sleeping monarch; and of what a rare as well as grateful luxury it might sometimes be in an eastern camp—a draught of it being brought (at the risk of his life,) to David, by this same Abishai, will by and by afford us a striking proof.

But in what very pardonable triumph did he now indulge, over the negligent guardians of their monarch's safety?

MARY. He cried to Abner, "Art not thou a valiant man? wherefore then hast thou not kept my lord the king? and now see where the king's spear is, and the cruse of water that was at his bolster?" Abner never answered, Mama, for what could he say? But Saul heard it, and said, "Is this thy voice, my son David?" How could he be so hypocritical!

MAMA. If you had duly observed, as you went along, the singular inconstancy of feeling, and rapid transitions from hate to penitence, which mark this unhappy slave of passion and impulse-you would rather have ascribed to them, than to actual hypocrisy, the use of expressions, as consistent with the usual tenor of Saul's character, as David's dutiful answer of "my lord O king"-is with the unswerving loyalty of his. Even this hove, er, as far it had been carried, by this best and most faithful of subjects-does not prevent his now firmly, though respectfully remonstrating with his persecutor-calmly desiring to know his offence-if really guilty, expressing his willingness to make atonement for the trespass to God-but if (as he well knew) the victim of slander and calumny, consigning-with the bitterness of an at length exasperated spirit-their authors to the merited vengeance of God.

But, even while blaming, in the milder light of our dispensation of mercy—the invocation of the Lord's "curse" on the head of any—let us remark, on what grounds alone it was, that His servant ventured to call it down. Was.it for depriving him of the favour of his sovereign, and of the temporal advantages connected with a residence in his own country?

MARY. Oh! no. For "driving him" out of the inheritance of the Lord, saying, "Go down, serve other gods." Mama! nobody could force him to do this.

MAMA. No. But by obliging him to wander among the neighbouring heathen—not only was he cut off from the spiritual privileges of his own national worship, but exposed to temptation, or persecution, on account of the unhallowed rites of others. Would that all of us were disposed to assign to our far more valuable spiritual blessings, the first place, (like David,) in our regard, or our regrets!

But do you perceive any peculiar fitness in the comparison of himself to a hunted "partridge," so affectingly used by David, to work on the bitter feelings of Saul?

MARY. No, Mama; people do not go out to "hunt" partridges, (as they do bears or wolves,) with great numbers, like Saul, but generally alone.

MAMA. Yes; in civilized countries, where sport, not subsistence, is the chief object. But the Arabs, we are told by eastern travellers, at this day,—instead of employing dogs to discover and surprise the unsuspecting game,—actually pursue them (as Saul did David) from place to place; till the poor birds, after repeatedly alighting, and being put up, sink finally exhausted, and are dispatched with bludgeons, in a manner we should think both cruel and disgraceful. These little particulars, trifling as they are, will enable you better to appreciate the similarity of David's condition, with that of the "hunted" bird, driven from each successive refuge by a band of releatless pursuers.

MARY. Mana, I wonder Saul never really became a good man; he was always so ready to say "I have "inned."

Mama. When you have lived longer in the world, my dear, you will find that the very facility of disposition which makes acknowledgment of error easy, is a fatal agent in its repetition. Had Saul, instead of saying he had "sinned," nay, "played the fool, and erred exceedingly,"—proved his conviction of the humiliating truth, by recalling David at once to his court and favour, his own sincerity would have been less questionable; and David would have been spared a cruel exile, from which his integrity, as well as life, were in imminent jeopardy.

But even while ruthlessly abandoned to such unmerited hardships and perils, by him who pretended to invoke on his head the blessing of the Lord —how far superior does David appear to his abject persecutor! What is his dignified reply to expressions of compunction, belied by the absence of any solid tokens of returning esteem and confidence?"

MARY. "The Lord render to every man his righteousness, and his faithfulness. For the Lord delivered thee into mine hand to-day; but I would not stretch forth mine hand against the Lord's anointed. And, behold, as thy life was much set by this day, in mine eyes, so let my life be much set by, in the eyes of the Lord; and let him deliver me out of all tribulation."

Mama. And would David, think you, have exchanged these feelings—not of proud human superiority, but conscious integrity, supported on the protection and immutable equity of God, for the temporary exaltation, and thorny throne of the man who shrunk in baffled littleness before him? No, Mary. And let us learn from his example, to share in his conviction, that "better is the favour of God than life,"—poverty, with his blessing, than unhallowed prosperity,—and even exile among heathens and enemies, preferable to a crown purchased by violation of His law, and rebellion against His anointed.

MORNING EIGHTH.

LESSON .- 1st Samuel, Chapter xxv.

MAMA. We have new returned to the lately omitted chapter containing the account of the transactions between David and the family of Nabal, the Carmelite; affording, not only many interesting particulars regarding the manners of the then (as now) almost patriarchal east, but instructive moral lessons for regulating our intercourse with our fellow-creatures of every rank; from which, even many who profess to be governed by the higher principle of Christian courtesy, need not disdain to derive an example.

But, by what melancholy event were the circumstances related in this chapter preceded?

MARY. The death of Samuel. No wonder, Mama, that all the Israelites lamented him.

MAMA. No, indeed. But I shall be glad if you can tell me on what especial qualities this universal regret was justly founded!

MARY. You know, Mama, we read all about his being prayed for by his mother, and then dedicated by her to God,—his being called in his sleep when a little child, and intrusted with God's sad message to Eli—and then his governing all Israel so well and justly for a very long time, that, when at last he made a king to please them, and bade them farewell, he challenged any one to say he had ever hurt or done him wrong.

Mama. A very good and succinct summary, my dear, of the delightful history we lately read, of one of God's most eminent and faithful servants; whose steadfastness and fidelity, remember—in times of corruption, such as those of Eli and Saul,—were entirely founded on the spirit and temper manifested by him in childhood.

How did he reply to the early call of the heavenly Master, to whose service he had been devoted in the cradle?

MARY. He first started up, and said, "Here am I," when he only thought old Eli called him. But when aware it was God himself, he said, "speak Lord, for thy servant heareth."

MAMA. Yes, Mary, and with Samuel, (as with all really faithful servants,) to "hear was to obey; and this principle it was which governed his long and useful life. Ready at God's command, to bear, like Moses, on his shoulders, the burden of a whole "stiff-necked and rebellious people,"—he was readier still to resign, without a regret, save for that people's misjudging choice,—the sway he had so unimpeachably exercised. He died at the ripe age of ninety-eight years; eighteen of which (since the accession of Saul) he had spent in tranquil and religious retirement. Can you tell me in what spot and society the prophet's declining age was passed?

MARY. We read of his lately being at Naioth, in the college of the prophets. But I suppose that was only at times; for his house was at Ramah, and there he was buried.

MAMA. In all probability, beside his good father, Elkench, and yet more excellent mother, Hannah; a place in the "sepulchre of their fathers" being to all pious Jews, an object of fervent and paramount desire. But what record, more lasting than the most costly or durable monument, has this great and good man left, to entitle him to the gratitude of Christians, as well as Israelites?

MARY. I suppose you mean this very book we are reading. Did he write it, Mama? But no, he could not, since it mentions his own death.

MAMA. The first twenty-four chapters (those we have have hitherto read) are universally ascribed to him; and the subsequent portion of David's history—which still goes under Samuel's name—is considered as part of the same work; originally undertaken by him, in conjunction with the prophets Nathan and Gad.

How deeply are we indebted, for the affecting accounts we have lately read, of David's early piety and triumphs—and subsequent reverses and wanderings—to him, who was not only their sympathizing eye-witness, but a counsellor in his trials, and a refuge in his persecutions. And how much of the resignation, and fortitude, and loyalty, we so much admire in the character of David, may be reasonably ascribed to the example and influence of his aged friend and benefactor; whose eyes again, must have closed in peace, on the no longer distant prospect of so promising a monarch (whom he had himself anointed) being exalted by the Lord, to rule over his beloved country.

But we must reluctantly take leave of Samuel, to follow David to the wilderness of Paran. Is there anything familiar to you in the title of this portion of the desert?

MARY. Yes; it is mentioned in the last song of Moses; and you told me it was one of the names of the desert of "Sinai."

MAMA. It was; and no doubt like his great predecessor Moses, David was reminded by the locality, that the spot on which he wandered was "holy ground." MARY. Oh! Mama, I am sorry to see that good faithful Caleb should have a churlish descendant like Nabal!

MAMA. It is indeed distressing, my dear, that virtues, like possessions, should not be here-ditary. But this, alas! we shall see yet more sadly exemplified in the family of David.

By what external circumstances—capable of softening the most unpromising natural temper—was the lot of this degenerate scion of Caleb, distinguished?

MARY. He was rich, and great, and prosperous—and had a beautiful, and good, and elever wife besides; but the "man was churlish, and evil in his doings."

MAMA. Yes, my dear, when prosperity fails to expand and soften, it too often hardens and contracts the heart. And on this account it is, as well as from the peculiar facilities they hold out to "forget God," that riches are said in Scripture to be a "temptation and a snare;" and the entrance of a "rich man" into the "kingdom of heaven," is represented by our Saviour, under a popular metaphor, almost amounting to impossibility. But remember, it is not to the possession, but the abuse of wealth, that the fearful denunciation applies; for it is those only who "trust in riches," who place on them their affections and confidence, to the exclusion of God and their fellow-creatures—who shall as fruitlessly expect to be saved, as the camels of Arabia, or the elephants of India, (where we find the proverb, quoted by our Lord, in daily use) would stoop their huge forms beneath a literal needles' eye—or rather, (as some interpret the proverb) those wicket gates of eastern court-yards, made purposely low, to exclude a mounted enemy.

But in what cheerful, and usually social occupation was Nabal engaged, when David's courteous, and, one would have thought, well-timed message, was delivered to him?

MARY. Sheepshearing, Mama. I believe it is always a time of rejoicing.

MAMA. Yes, in all pastoral countries; where so much of wealth is derived from the produce of the flocks, in which the riches of their mightiest princes chiefly consist; and the very extent of which, ought, in the present case, to have disposed the possessor to munificence. Was there anything in the message itself to provoke displeasure?

MARY. Oh, no; it was the kindest, as well as civilest, ever delivered. It did nothing but wish Nabal, and all he had, peace and prosperity; and ask him very modestly, for a little of what he could so well spare.

MAMA. Had David any right-beyond the nere natural claim of every one in straits, on his richer brethren—to presume on the liberality of Nabal?

MARY. I don't know, Mama; all he says is, that he never hart Nabal's shepherds, or took any thing of their's, while they were together. This was not much.

MAMA. Yes, if you reflect that in so saying, (considering the lawless character and frequent distress for subsistence of his exiled followers,) David insinuates, though in the most delicate manner, the positive protection he must have afforded to the unwarlike servants of Nabal. Such a plea, at such a joyous time, ought indeed to have "found favour in the eyes of Nabal;" and its brutal repulse was as ungenerous towards a kind and considerate neighbour, as it was impolitic towards an armed and powerful one.

What was the insulting tenor of Nabal's answer?

MARY. Oh! the rudest in the world. He said, "Who is David the son of Jesse? There be many servants now-a-days that break away, every man from his master." And he would give him nothing—not even the "water" he had "provided for his shearers." Why is that mentioned, Mama? Surely if there was water to wash sheep in, there would be plenty to drink.

MAMA. I wish the reflection you bestowed, on recollecting that sheep were washed, previous to shearing, had extended to the unfitness thus occasioned in the pool, or river, for immediate drinking, and which no doubt gave rise to the previous "provision;" though to this day, travellers tell us, that "carrying water" to the reapers and field labourers, is a regular branch of castern harvest expense.

What appears to have been David's first impulse, on receiving so affronting a message?

MARY. To go and punish Nabal at once for he ordered four hundred men to get ready for fighting. How could Nabal be such a fool as to provoke him?

MAMA. The surly and brutal, Mary, are seldom endowed with prudence. But by whom was the "soft answer" that "turneth away wrath" providentially found?

MARY. By Abigail, Nubal's wife. She was a sensible person, and could understand reason, and that made the servants tell her what David had done for them. And I see, Mama, it wareally all as you supposed—for the men said he had been "as a wall to them, night and day." How well he deserved all he had asked from Nabal!

MAMA. And how fortunate for all concerned, that the influence conferred by her discretion upon Abigail, in the household of her stupid and ferocious husband, enabled her to save his property, if not his life, by a well-timed and munificent present. In what did this seasonable supply for Devid's famishing followers consist?

MARY. "Two hundred loaves, and five sheep, ready dressed," (I suppose, for the sheep-shearers, else she would hardly have had so many by her,) and corn, and figs, and raisins, and the "two bottles" of wine, which I used to wonder at when a ch"d,—till you explained to me that they were large sains like barrels. Abigail was quite right to go herself, and make the apology; but why did she send the present on before her?

MAMA. As an obvious means of conciliation, lest David's exasperated feelings should have denied her a patient hearing. Do you remember any other instance in Scripture, where one, more guilty far than poor Abigail, and justly doubtful of his reception, took the same precaution?

MARY. Let me think. Did not Jacob, when fraid to face Esau, send him a large present of cattle beforehand?

MAMA. Precisely; and as presents in the east, betoken submission, as well as good will, the policy in both cases was good.

Had Abigail miscalculated the probable anger of David?

Many. Oh! no. It was very different now from his gentleness to Saul; for he resolved to kill Nabal, and all belonging to him. Yet surely Saul's ingratitude was worse than Nabal's!

MAMA. Certainly, Mary, more bitter and cutting, and reiterated fur. And this should shew us that pious scruples had power to restrain (in the former instance) the warmth of temper now so visible in David. It was the monarch, not the man, he respected and spared in Saul,—the "anointed of the Lord," and not his own personal enemy, towards whom the forbearance we so much admire, was chiefly exercised.

But we shall find, that though passionate under strong provocation, David was at all times placable; by his ready acceptance of the humble excuses of Abigail. What did she plead?

MARY. The natural folly of her husband, whose name, "Nabal," she says, " is like him;"—what does it mean?

MAMA. A "foolish man," and was probably like many in the east, rather a by-word founded on his character, than a name given at birth, by wealthy parents to their heir.

But how artfully does Abigail congratulate

David (as if he were already appeased, and his anger averted) on having been withheld by the Lord from avenging his own quarrel; and found upon this anticipated forbearance, a flattering prediction of his future success against his enemies. In what terms is this remarkably fulfilled assurance conveyed?

MARY. "The Lord will surely make my lord a sure howse; because my lord fighteth the battles of the Lord; and evil hath not been found in thee all thy days." Mama, what a strange expression the uses, when she says, David's soul "shall be bound up in the bundle of life" with God. I have heard it sometimes used in prayers, but could hardly understand it.

MAMA. The figure is a strong, and eastern, but very expressive one, especially when contrasted with our Lord's description of the "tares," gathered together in "bundles," to be burned; or the simile here applied to David's enemies, of worthless stones, which, when once cast out of a sling, having answered their purpose, are no more ought after or valued.

But how gladly do we recognize the upright and amiable prevailing character of David's mind, in that feature of Abigail's address to which he instantly refers, as having not only disarmed his resentment, but proved a blessing from the Lord, in so doing. Far from assuming, as a merit, the relinquishment of his sanguinary purpose, or attributing it with eastern hyperbole, to the personal attractions to which he so soon after shewed himself not insensible—he first blesses "the Lord God of Israel, who had that day sent her to him," and the advice so prudently and discreetly given,-and then the giver of it, who had, under providence, kept him from coming to "shed blood," and avenging himself with his own hand. So that it is neither elation at the abject submission of a woman of almost princely rank, nor complacency in her prediction of his own future greatness, but thankfulness for having been preserved from sin, which occupies the prominent place in his feelings and reply.

It is this tenderness of conscience—and docility under divine rebuke—and instant recoil, as it were, of the better part of David's nature from the verge, (as well as in some unhappy instances from the fatal precincts of crime,) which, deeply studied, and carefully weighed against the few but heinous transgressions of his life—would go far to justify, even to our finite apprehensions, the favourable estimate formed by Ilim, "to whom all hearts are open," of the character of his much calumniated servant. Our short acquaintance with it has already shewn us that it combined piety, humility, and sincerity towards God, with candour, generosity, and forgiveness towards men, even enemies; and yet it is no uncommon thing with those, who are themselves utter strangers to such heavenly dispositions, to rail at David as a compound of crimes, and at God, as if he complacently connived at or approved them.

But if emotions of gratitude, for the prevention of sin, were thus uppermost in the breast of David, when he courteously dismissed Abigail—what 'let had the recital of his narrow escape, on the brutal rich man; who, having like his gospel prototype, "goods laid up for many years," had said to his soul, "eat, drink, and be merry?"

MARY. Oh! Mama! when the drunken wretch came to himself, and his wife told him these things, "his heart died within him, and he became as a stone." But was it really on David's account that God smote Nabal, so that he died ten days after?

MAMA. There is nothing in the expression, Mary, to lead us to suppose that the event was any other than an ordinary visitation of providence—accelerated, probably, by the man's own vices of brutality and intemperance; the former of which, prompted him to outrage—while the effects of the latter, left his frame so enfectled, as to render the shock of David's, even meditated vengeance, fatal. It is stated by Josephus, and believed by the Jews in general, that a stroke of apoplexy thus occasioned, was the cause of Nabal's quickly following death.

Be this as it may, David's gratitude for divine interposition, was enhanced by the absence of guilt on his part, in the removal of his unreasonable foc.

By what step did he shortly after prove his approbation of the rare virtue and prudence of Abigail?

MARY. By proposing to take her to wife. I thought he was married already to Michal, Saul's daughter, who had saved his life by her cleverness. What had become of her all this time?

MAMA. The end of our chapter tells us she had been unjustifiably bestowed, by her father, on another man, "Phalti the son of Laish;" so that David (even had the unhappy custom of the time not allowed a plurality of wives,) was, in the eyes of man, released from his former ties. But amiable, and discreet, and modest as Abigail's previous conduct, and present reply to his proposals, proved her to be—never forget, Mary, while reading the history of David, that to the fatal abuse of the tacit permission, rather than express sanction of the Mosaic law, for the multiplicity of wives, may be traced most of the dreadful crimes and misfortunes, by which his family was disgraced, and his own paternal feelings outraged and torn.

From the union (here recorded,) with Ahinoam the Jezreelitess, sprung one of the most criminal, as well as unfortunate of the sons of David; the guilty source of nearly all the tissue of horrors, which sent the grey-headed parent of a degenerate offspring, mouraing to his grave.

MARY. Mama! I wonder a woman so great and powerful as Abigail had shown herself to be, spoke so slavishly, and bowed her face to the ground when David's servants came to ask her to marry him. She could not have been more humble and delighted, if she had been a poor gleaner, like Ruth.

MAMA. Alas! Mary, in the east still, as in those times, the riches and consequence of a woman, even of princely rank, generally expire with her husband. And such are the evils, to which the want of a male protector there, exposes a lone female, that the seeming precipitation with which Abigail accompanied the servants of David, is fully accounted for; while the retinue of five damsels, who followed her steps, formed, probably, the only relies of the state and grandeur which, during Nabal's life, she had enjoyed.

But the exchange, to a woman of her disposition, must have been a blessed one, from hourly shame and disgust at the conduct of a wealthy but illiberal churl, to sharing the fortunes (precarious as they were) of a chosen servant of dod; and future ruler—as she herself had predic ed—over his people Israel.

Of her subsequent conduct on a throne we know nothing; but may derive from her behaviour in a private station, (examples drawn from which are more generally applicable,) lessons of feminine prudence, gentleness, and courtesy; by the judicious exercise of which in women, much mischief among ruler spirits, may often be averted; and the female character displayed in its fairest and most valuable light, as the healer of angry passions, and promoter of peace and good will among mankind.

MORNING NINTH.

Lisson-1st Samuel, Chapters xxvii. xxix. and xxx.

MARY. Mama! I am shocked and surprised that David should say in his heart, at the beginning of our first chapter, that he should "surely perish the day, by the hand of Saul!" Had he forgotted God's promises, and all his own beautiful psalms, that he ran away to the wicked Philistines?

MAMA. My dear Mary, the disapprobation you express, is only natural. But, alas! not more so, than the occasional distrust and despondence of the most favoured of God's servants, when the sustaining influence of the Holy Spirit is (probably for their wholesome abasement) temporarily withdrawn. Did the confidence of Abraham, of Moses, of Elijah, those "excellent ones of the earth," never desert them—or has the same Spirit failed to record other instances, for our mingled humiliation and encouragement?

MARY. No, indeed. Abraham called Sarah his sister, out of fear; and Moses was afraid to go to Pharaoh; and Elijah fled into the wilderness from Jezebel. But then God had not told any of them so plainly as David, that they should live to be kings.

MAMA. Nay, Mary; surely the promise to Abraham, of being (through his yet unborn offspring) the author of blessings to the whole human race—and the power of working miracles, conferred on Moses and Elijah—rendered despondence in them, quite as surprising as in the case of David. That it was sinful in them all, even your imperfect knowledge of divine things, has taught you. May you never learn, from sad experience, that the brighter promises of the Christian, do not always exempt him from its sinful and humbling recurrence!

But let us shew, in the meantime, a Christian spirit, by sympathizing with, and making allowance for the harassed, and at length, intolerable situation of David in the native country he had so nobly benefited—and in which, to borrow our Lord's affecting language,—though "foxes had holes, and birds of the air, nests," even the "rocks of the wild goats" had been invaded, in pursuit of him, by enemies thirsting for his blood.

MARY. But, Mama! how could be go back to Gath? the people there, he knew, had nearly killed him before, about Goliath.

MAMA. If you consult your map of Palestine, you will see, that from Judea lying as it does, a mere narrow strip of country, bounded on one side by the sea, and on others by the desert—opportunities of refuge with neighbouring nations, were necessarily very few. Moab had already given shelter to his aged parents,—and towards Annals ', almost the only other bordering people) David cherished, as the faithful servant of God, the most inextinguishable hatred; of which we shall soon have a terrible proof.

But did he voluntarily prolong the stay, you so  $m_n$  a wonder at, in Gath?

MARY. No; he asked Achish for a town to himself. I was sure he could not be happy in Gath long.

MAMA. No, Mary; not only on account of the ill offices and indignities of his former enemies, at the court of Achish, but because of the temptation, (before alluded to by him) into which he might have been led to join, or at least countenance his benefactor's idolatrous worship. From this, in a city made over to himself, he would be xempt. What was its name?

MARY. "Ziklag;" and it says, it always belonged to Judah afterwards.

MAMA. And in thus bestowing it, Achish unconsciously fulfilled the designs of Providence; as, though never conquered by them, it formed part of the original inheritance of Judah, and though temporarily transferred, in a subsequent allotment, to the tribe of Simcon,—it ultimately you see, became (by the gift of a heathen king) the property of those to whom Moses had assigned it.

MARY. Mama! David was quite right to do to the Amalekites what God was so angry with Saul for not doing; but I wish he had not said to Achish, that it was people of Judah, he had been fighting against. How could such a courageous man tell a lie about it?

MAMA. To teach us, Mary, the bitter, but salutary lesson, how much more easy and common, are the loftiest efforts of mere animal bravery, than the moral courage required to encounter the consequences of our own right actions. In the fear and strength of his God, David could attack, and utterly spoil the powerful Amalekites -left to his own weakness, he condescended to an unmanly evasion, and chose rather to pass for a base traitor to his own nation, than a bold avenger of its wrongs, and its God. That the deceit was too shallow, to ensure even its unhallowed purpose, of quieting the suspicions, and lulling the jealousies of the Philistines, we see from the beginning of the chapter, to which, (for the sake of connexion) I have made you pass. But let me see if you can gather from it, to what dreadfully sinful alternative, his former prevarieation, had well nigh reduced the anointed king of Israel?

MARY. The Philistines gathered together all their armies to "Aphek;" and, as it says, the Israelites pitched near "Jezreel." I suppose they were going to have a battle. And was David really going to be so wicked as to join Goo's enemies against his own people?

M. : A. What his line of conduct, in a fatal dilenara of his own creating, would have really been, had not the natural misgivings of his heathen allies been so mercifully overruled by God, as to make for him, "with the temptation, a way to escape,"-we cannot presume to pronounce. From his well-known patriotism, it seems most likely-(a belief confirmed by his equivocal answer to Achish.) that he would really have justified the suspicions of the Philistine princes, by going over once more to the ranks of his lawful sovereign; and in thus doing, have requited with perfidious ingratitude, three years of generous protection from Achish. But Mary, what a strong, what an irresistible lesson does this dilemma of David .involving on the one hand forfeiture of allegiance to his king, his country, and his God, -and on the other hand, base ingratitude and treachery to his benefactor,—afford against placing ourselves, by any deliberate act of our own, in situations of inevitable temptation!

Had David remained, to use his own noble but forgotten expressions,-" under the shadow of the wings of the Almighty," even an "outcast in Israel,"-he might now, in the great national emergency, have been very probably recalled to fight under the banners of his reconciled sovereign, and side by side with his beloved Jonathanagainst the hereditary enemies of Israel; instead of being ignominiously hunted as a traitor and renegade, from what he emphatically calls the "tents of Meshech." And had he never, with cowardly duplicity, suffered his just vengeance on Amalek, to pass for a hostile inroad against Judea,-not even the unsuspecting and confiding monarch of Gath himself, could have dreamed of summoning the conqueror of Goliath to unnatural participation in an expedition against Israel. that to his unhappy selection of a heathen protector-and subsequent deception, practised on that very benefactor-we can clearly trace the sinful predicament in which David stood, as an ally in the camp of the ungodly; and his shameful (though providential) expulsion from its unhallowed ranks.

MARY. How thankful he must have been when he was sent away—without either fighting against his people, or betraying good-natured Achish.

MAMA. Yes! and to God alone could be ascribe a deliverance from a choice of evils, entirely beyond his own skill to accomplish.

But was his absence on this unholy service, wholly unproductive of suffering?

MARY. Oh! no. The Amalekites had taken advantage of it, and burnt his town, and taken all the people prisoners—David's wives, and all! He may deserved it, Mama; and I am not very sorry for him, though he "wept till he had no more power to weep."

MAMA. These were wholesome tears, depend upon it, Mary—and extorted from so courageous and manly a spirit, far more by a sense of deserved chastisement, than by the temporary loss even of those dearest to him. That they were in reality, drawn forth by penitence, (though embittered doubtless by the just reproaches of his indignant followers, who even "spake of stoning him,") appears from the immediate consolation which David in his grief, sought from his outraged, but merciful God.

Did his sense of having offended, estrange him, as it does too many—from the footstool of the Majesty on High?

MARY. No; he sent for Abiathar the priest, and enquired of the Lord whether he should pursue after the Amalekites. Mama! I am glad he did it,—and he must have been glad to have the priest and the "ephod" by him. But surely any man so fond of his wives and children, and so bold as David was, would have tried to get them back, at the risk of his life, even without asking leave.

MAMA. And this is precisely what makes David's submissive reference to Him whose hand had dealt the blow-before attempting to recover his precious domestic treasures-a clear proof of his humbled and penitent frame of mind; and accounts, in the only profitable, satisfactory, and convincing manner, for the gracious encouragement, and ultimate success vouchsafed by Him whose "name is mercy," and who afflicts his children but to draw them to Himself. No sooner is the permission given, and Divine power pledged to the happy result, than we see David's natural courage and determination revive,-for so hotly is the pursuit conducted, that two hundred, out of his six hundred followers, are left, utterly exhausted, by the side of a friendly brook!

But by what providential state of destitution in another—and an enemy—was David's uncertainty as to the course pursued by the ravagers of his household—removed?

MARY. A young Egyptian had been left sick by his Amalekite master, in the fields, till he was half dead and famished; and he told David's people where their enemies would be found. I suppose it was out of revenge for his master leaving him so inhumanly.

MAMA Partly, no doubt; for in those days the life of a slave (which all servants were) was of little account in the eyes of any one. But let us ho, that gratitude for rescue from present famine, had its share in influencing the poor fugitive.

In what defenceless state were the spoilers of Ziklag discovered, by its bereaved husbands and fathers?

MARY. "All spread abroad upon the earth, cating, and drinking, and dancing, because of all the great spoil they had taken from Ziklag, and from the land of Judah." So they had been robbing David's own countrymen at home, besides!

MAMA. Yes, which would no doubt assist in animating his vengeance. But why, do you suppose, were the luckless invaders so utterly secure, and careless of pursuit?

Mary. Because they could not know that David would be sent back from the army, and supposed him with Achish all the time. Mama! if God had let him stay with the Philistines, he never would have seen wife or child more!

MAMA. Most probably not; which must have enhanced his sense of God's undeserved and timely interposition. But do you remark any thing in the account given of the slaughter of the Amalekites, which makes it evident that without Divine encouragement and aid, it would have been equally mad and vain in David to pursue or attack them?

MARY. It says, "there escaped not a man of them, save four hundred young men, that got away on camels." Surely, Mama, if such were the small remains of their army (just as many as David had altogether) he never could have got back his wives and goods unless God had helped him.

MAMA. Certainly not; nor could the attempt have ever been made, but in the strength of a higher Power, and under a sense of Divine forgiveness and reconciliation.

By what act of mingled kindness and justice to others did David acknowledge the greatness of his personal mercies?

MARY. The four hundred strong men who went all the way with David, and fought with the Amalekites—wanted not to give any share of what they had taken back, to those who were too tired to go on. How unjust!

Mana. Stay Mary, are you not doing injustice yourself, to the brave band by whom the rescue was accomplished—by involving all in an act of selfish and narrow policy, in which four hundred of David's chosen companions were surely incapable of concurring?

MARY. Oh! I see, it was only the "wicked men, and men of Belial of those who went with David," that said so; I beg pardon of the others.

MA . Let it be a warning to you against all hasty and general accusations, often involving, on no better grounds, the innocent with the guilty. How did David nobly rebuke the unbrotherly spirit by which his troop of chosen warriors was partially infected and disgraced?

MARY. He said, "ye shall not do so, my brethren, with that which the Lord hath given us; who hath preserved us, and delivered the company that came against us, into our hand." Mama, David speaks like himself now; I am always so sorry when he does otherwise!

MAMA. Are you indeed, my child? and does your young heart take an unconscious interest in the manifestations of a "renewed and contrite spirit," in the breast of a king of Israel who lived three thousand years ago? And do you think He by whom that heart was formed, and who knows its "very frame"—does not watch, with far holier and intenser earnestness, the first movement of returning piety and penitence, in your own, and every human bosom? If there is "joy among the angels in heaven over one sinner that repenteth,"—never forget the far loftier, yet deeper interest of the God of angels, in the welfare of the "souls that He hath made."

I am persuaded Mary, that were one spark of the feeling of praiseworthy cinulation, which makes a child, in the presence of an affectionate parent, guard its behaviour, and double its exertionstransferred, as is due, to our Father in heaven" -we should soon have answering proofs, as certain perhaps, though not so obvious, as his returning mercies to David,-that, in the inspired and cheering words of the Psalmist himself, "The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord, and he delighteth in his way"-that " He will hear his cry when his heart is overwhelmed, and will set him on the rock that is higher than he"-that He who hath shewn him great and sore troubles, shall quicken him again, and bring him up from the depths of the earth"-that "the Lord will give grace and glory, and withhold no good thing from him that walketh uprightly," and that "he will perfect all that concerneth him, because his mercy endureth for ever."

But lest the diffidence and humility inseparable from conscious guilt, should deter any from appropriating promises, conferred on the righteous alone—let us hear those which the same Holy Spirit addresses to the erring and penitent.

- "Blessed is the man whom the Lord chasteneth, and teacheth him out of his law."
- " He shall speak peace unto his people, and unto his; ints, but let them not turn again unto folly."
- "He forgiveth all their iniquities, and healeth all their diseases, and crowneth them with mercy and loving kindness."
- " For he knoweth their frame, and remembereth that they are but dust."
- "Those who sow in tears shall reap in joy, and he who goeth forth weeping and bearing precious seed, shall return again with rejoicing bearing his sheaves with him."
- "He shall lead them, and his right hand shall hold them, and when the love of God is in their heart, none of their footsteps shall slide."

And finally, to reassure them as to their ultimate portion,

"The salvation of the righteous is of the Lord, for He is their strength."

"Blessed are the people that know the joyful sound, for they shall walk in the light of his countenance for ever."

MORNING TENTH.

LESSON.-1st Samuel, Chapters xxviii. and xxxi.

MARY. I suppose, Mama, as you made me leave out this chapter, what passed in it between Achish and David about fighting against Israel, belongs to our yesterday's reading.

MAMA. It does. But it was not without a double reason that I determined to preserve unbroken the connexion between Saul's unlawful attempts to penetrate the future,—and the accomplishment of the awful prediction they elicited. In the first place, because some of the best and most careful expositors hold it to have been literally fulfilled, by the defeat and death, on the actual "morrow," of the rejected monarch; and recause (even should a few days or longer have intervened) it must ever be profitable to trace—as visibly as we are here permitted to do, the connexion between crime and punishment—between deserved abandonment by God, and disgree, defeat, and despair. As if to signify the removal of the last shield interposed by the prayer of the righteous between Saul and his impending doom—the death of Samuel—generally believed to have happened about four months previous, is again recorded; and nothing can more strongly prove the involuntary confidence, which (even under long and melancholy estrangement) Saul reposed in his early master,—than his desire to recall, from the quiet of the grave, this bold, though reluctant reprover. So true is it, Mary, that when every ground of false trust is at the hour of peril or death, "utterly swept away," even the wicked are fain to flee for refuge to the formerly despised, or at least, unheeded professors of true religion.

But what emphatic precept of the law of Moses had Saul (at the suggestion, it is thought, of holy Samuel) early in his reign, enforced?

MARY. Putting away "those that had familiar spirits, and wizards out of the land." Mama! had any body ever really devils under their command,—or did they only pretend to it?

MAMA. To what extent (previous to the coning of our Lord, and consequent limitation of his "kingdom") Satan had power given him to delude the souls, as we know he was permitted to enslave the bodies of men—it might be presumptuous to determine. All we know is, that pretenders to necromancy in later times, have been universally either the authors of gross imposture, or the victims of superstitious folly. That the woman mentioned in our chapter, belonged to the former class, is evident from the terror and surprise with which she was overwhelmed, when, by a higher agency, the power to which she pretended, was really exercised.

But by what fatal emergency was Saul driven to invoke one of the very sorceresses he had formerly proscribed and extirpated?

Mat.r. The Philistines had "gathered themselves together, and came and pitched in Shunem;" and you know, Mama, he had now no David to fight on his side, but I suppose, rather expected him to be with Achish against him.

Mama. True. And how much must he now have regretted the loss of his bravest, and most faithful champion; especially as we are told, on the authority of ancient writers—that this (on account of the Philistines being joined by an immense body of expatriated Egyptians) was by far the most formidable invasion with which they ever menaced Israel.

But, Mary, was it the "fear and trembling," alone, with which the approach of his enemies inspired him,—that shook the once bold and warlike spirit of Saul?

MARY. Oh! no. Time was, when he would not have been afraid, had they been twice as many! But though he did enquire of God, "the Lord answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets." Mama! I thought David had got the high priest and ephod with him; and you told me, the "Urim," was in the high priest's breast-plate.

Mama. I am glad you recollected this; but certain it is, that had the oracular breast-plate even been left behind, in the hurry of Abiathar's flight, after the massacre of his relatives, there was no one by whom, in his absence, it could be lawfully consulted. No wonder, therefore, that an "answer" was denied.

To what miserable expedient, for ascertaining the fate of the impending battle, was the misgiving heart of the unhappy monarch of Israel reduced?

MARY. He said, "Seek me out a woman that hath a familiar spirit, that I may go and enquire of her."

MAMA. And does not this act of wilful and presumptuous disobedience, fully justify the Divine denial of counsel or aid, to one—prepared to resort, on the disappointment, to the very means which the God whom he mocked with "enquiries," had utterly denounced and forbidden? The wretched object of his unhallowed pursuit, herself felt and derided an inconsistency, which she could only construe into a "snare," unworthy of a great monarch, for her conviction and apprehension, as a "witch." Nor could aught less than the yet grosser inconsistency, of a king of Israel swearing to her, by the God who had expressly said in his law, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live,"—convince her that her life was indeed safe.

What did she, at his request, then undertake? MARY. To bring up Samuel from the grave. Mana! could she, or any one, do this?

Mama. Certainly not. But if, (like similar impostors of more modern times) she hoped, by the combined influence of glimmering darkness, of magical incantations, and optical delusions,—to work on the excited imagination of her royal visitor,—her schemes were unexpectedly and awfully forestalled, by the supernatural ascent from the grave, of him, whose rest, she well knew, it mocked her power to have successfully disturbed.

MARY. Oh! Mother! no wonder she "cried with a loud voice!" It was just as if people, playing at ghosts, to frighten others, were suddenly to see a real one! But why did she say.

she saw "gods" ascending out of the earth? were there more than one?

MAMA. No, Mary; but in her first awe and affright, at the supernatural vision, she used the same plural Hebrew word for God, which occurs in Genesis and elsewhere, and is often quoted, as confirming in a remarkable manner, the mysterious doctine of the Trinity. Saul's immediate question, however, "What form is he of," is a plain proof, that he understood her to speak of one being only.

MARY. I suppose, when she answered, an old man cometh up, and he is covered with a mantle, Saul must have ventured to look up; and when he "perceived that it was Samuel, he stooped with his face to the ground, and bowed himself."

Mama. Yes, Mary. In this act of abject humiliation before a greater than Samuel, by whom Saul felt he had been miraculously sent—as well as in the solemn rebuke, and unerring prediction of the resuscitated prophet—we may read the answer to the opinion held by some, either that the whole was a mere juggle, contrived and executed by the pretended sorceress—or the permitted work of evil spirits, actually evoked at her bidding. The former idea may have originated naturally enough with that unthinking multitude, by whom all miraculous ngency is derided, or disbelieved. But how the latter notion (worthy only of the "house divided against itself," of the Pharisaical cavillers of our Lord's day,) came to find a place in the creed of any Christian, I am at a loss to imagine. In the only authentic addresses of evil spirits recorded in Scripture, as in the case of Eve in paradise -our Lord in the wilderness-and the assembled kings of Israel and Judah, to whom a "lying spirit" was mysteriously sent forth from before the F. atain of all Truth-delusion and deception was the universal object. And so unnatural must such awful words of godly rebuke, as became the mouth of Samuel, ever appear on the "lying lips" of a minister of darkness - that those only, to whom the "casting out of devils, by Beelzebub their prince" offers no contradiction, can ascribe them to infernal agency.

Let us, my dear Mary, draw from this awful interruption of the order of Providence, the solemn warnings which fell too late on the ear of the infatuated Saul. Let us tremble, as we learn from run, "who, being dead, yetspeaketh,"—the appalling truth, that there is a period, when the long "grieved," and "quenched Spirit," finally "departs," and becomes an enemy. And that, in this state of anticipated spiritual death, not only "Moses and the prophets," nay, the blessed Gospel itself may become powerless to save or awaken; but that conviction would not be produced, even "though one rose from the dead!"

Did, indeed, this wonderfully-raised messenger deliver any new or different doctrine from what he often, when in the flesh, fruitlessly inculcated.

MARY. Oh! no. He just told Saul, as he had done years before, that, because he had disobeyed God, and spared the Amalekites, "the Lord had rent the kingdom out of his hand, and given it to his neighbour David." But what terrified Saul, I suppose, was to be told, that his time was at last come, and that, "to-morrow," he and his sons should be with Samuel.

Mama. Yes, Mary, such is often the appalling effect of an announcement that cannot be mistaken, of approaching judgment, on the most callous and impenitent heart! As long as the denunciation was vague and distant, Saul could defy and disregard it; but when a voice from the tomb thus addressed him, "Thou fool!" to-morrow "shall thy soul be required of thee;" he sunk powerless on the earth; and "great fear fell on him, and there was no strength in him." Those who are fond of tracing coincidences have found a curious and not unedifying one, between the earliest and latest crime of Saul,—between the power of sin in his first open act of disobedience—and in that infraction of the express law of God, by which the measure of his iniquity was at length filled up.

Do you remember by what strong terms of comparison, Samuel, while yet alive, stigmatized the pretended humanity of Saul in sparing Agag?

MARY. No. But I will look back and find it. Oh! I see what you mean. He says, "Rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft." And now Saul! A been guilty of both; so no wonder God left hart to his fate. But, Mama, though any one might be sorry to see a king in so sad a condition, I am surprised a "witch" should have so much good in her as to kill a fatted calf for him, and use him so kindly.

Mama. Divination in those days, Mary, though forbidden among the Jews, by laws both human and divine, was held by neighbouring nations, in high esteem and veneration. And their "sibyls," or "pythonesses," (by which names females pretending to oracular power, were known,) being generally brought up in temples, and esteemed sacred, there did not attach to their vocation any of those sordid ideas of ill-will and malevolence, usually associated with "witcheraft," by the vulgar among ourselves. Do you not remember the traveller who lately pointed out to us, in his plan of Pompeii, the secret communication between the scat of the "Pythoness" in the temple of Isis, and the priests by whom her responses were to be dictated?

Many. Oh! yes; we saw it quite plainly; and I see now, that a witch in Judea might be a very different person from a witch in England.

MAMA. In external condition certainly. But never forget that both were alike impostors and liars; and as such, objects of contempt to man, and indignation to the God of truth.

But let us turn from their delusions, to the word of Him who "cannot lie." How were these, in the second of our chapters, sadly fulfilled?

MARY. "The men of Israel fled from before the Philistines, and fell down slain on Mount Gilboa." And oh! Mama! Jonathan was killed with the rest of the king's sons. How sorry David would be when he heard it!

MAMA. That he was so, you will indeed see and feel, when the most pathetic lamentation ever called forth by human friendship, comes under our notice to-morrow. But we must now follow to its close, the sad career of Saul.

By what event was he disabled from saving himself by flight?

MARY. "The archers hit him, and he was sore wounded of the archers." What a state he must have been reduced to, Mania, when he begged his armour-bearer, as a favour, to kill him!

Mana. Yes; and when, on his servant's refusal, he, with a borrowed "sword," (his own having evidently been lost,) despairingly accomplished the work of self-destruction! It will, I daresay; be a satisfection to you to learn, that as the Jews constantly affirm this "armour-bearer" to have been none other than "Doeg the Edomite,"—his own suicide, and that of his wretched master, w: probably perpetrated, with the very sword with which he sacrilegiously slew, at Saul's command, the anointed priests of the Lord.

MARY. Indeed it was only fair and right; and every body must think so. I am very sorry Jonathan's body was stripped and abused with the rest; for I am sure he did not deserve it.

MAMA. No, Mary. But from the inevitable involvement of the innocent in national calamities—let us draw the pleasing, as well as Scriptural inference of a future state of retribution; when "love" shall "have its perfect work"—and friendship "put on immortality"—and David and Jonathan, as they were "lovely in their lives" shall be, by death, no more "divided."

MORNING ELEVENTII.

LESSON .- 2d Samuel, Chapters i. and ii.

MAMA. I am sure, my dear Mary, from your evident participation in the deep and pathetic feelings expressed by David, on hearing of the death of your favourite Jonathan, that you no longer doubt the extent either of his gratitude or his distress. By those, even disposed to treat with unhallowed levity the less praise-worthy parts of his character, the Psalmist is here allowed to have lent to friendship and sorrow all the pathos and dignity of which language is susceptible. And yet so simple are the words, and so natural the ideas they convey, that the heart of the rudest savage, or youngest child, would overflow with responsive emotion.

At what time of personal triumph and exaltation was this disastrous news communicated to David?

MARY. Just after he had slain the Amalekites, and brought back his wives and children to Ziklag. Mama, he must have been aware whenever he saw a man with rent clothes, and earth on his head, that he had bad news to tell.

MAMA. Why so? what did these tokens indicate?

MARY. Excessive grief. You know Joh's friends sat with him on the ground, and put dust on their heads, because of his afflictions—and the hypocritical Pharisees tore their clothes in pretended distress at our Lord's making himself God.

M: .... And was the outward mourning of this Amalekite for the monarch he only pretended to have mercifully slain, a bit more real, or sincere than their's?

MARY. I suppose not; else he would never have made a merit of killing him. But how do we know he did not speak the truth?

MAMA. Because, well contrived and circumstantial as is his artful tale to obtain favour from Saul's presumed enemy—it is at variance with the inspired record of that unhappy monarch's self-murder which we read yesterday—with his avowed horror of dying by the hand of the "un-circumcised"—and with the subsequent suicide of Doeg; which is expressly said to have been occasioned by despair, at seeing his master dead before him. But providence having sent to the fatal scene this stranger, for the apparent purpose of transmitting to David (ere the bodies were despoiled by the Philistines) the crown and other insignia, of a kingdom now rightfully his own—not content with this melancholy service, for which he would probably have been rewarded—Satan put it into his heart to arrogate to himself the supposed additional merit of having secured David's succession, by putting an end to the life of the late king.

MARY. David surely believed him at the time, though we know better; else he would not have ordered him to be slain.

MAMA. That he did, we may be sure, both from the execution itself, and from what he says on the subject elsewhere—when expressing his indignation at a similar crime. It was perhaps from some recantation of the disappointed traitor (disbelieved at the moment as the result of fear) that the true account of Saul's miserable end by his own hand was confirmed.

But was there anything, think you, of deceit or hypocrisy, in the deep sorrow evinced by David. for the race so disastrously slain by the enemics of Israel?

MARY. Oh! no. Even if David had not loved Jonathan so heartily, and grieved for the death of the Lord's people—he was so good hearted that I am sure he would have mourned sincerely, even for Saul.

MAMA. Yes, Mary, such is the impression involuntarily left on our minds, by his constant generosity and tenderness, towards the most relentless and unprovoked of foes—that not one of his modern enemies has ever reproached him for blending, in one beautiful strain of pathetic lamentation, the name of Saul, with that of his far different son.

But before entering minutely on its beauties let us pause a moment to trace, in an apparently irrelevant circumstance—the painful impression made on the mourner's mind, by the immediate cause of the death of Saul.

How came the king to be so disabled, as not to be able to effect his escape?

MARY. Because the archers hit him, "and he was sore wounded of the archers." Now I see Mama, why that verse (which I used to think had no business there) about David teaching "the men of Judah the use of the bow," comes in where it does, at the beginning of his lamentation.

MAMA. Yes, Mary; and the precaution so immediately taken, shews David at once in the light of a wise king, and of a generously concerned foe.

By what name does he jointly apostrophize the fallen "mighty?"

MARY. "The beauty of Israel;"—you know, Mama, Saul was remarkably handsome, and Jonathan probably resembled him. At all events, he was beautiful, we are sure, in the eyes of David.

MAMA. And what feelings of patriotic and national concern, take precedence, in the pious mind of David, even of his own great personal loss, and sorrow?

MARY. The triumph and rejoicing of the Philistines, when it should come to be told in Gath and Askelon.

MAMA. Yes; but it is still as the "uncircumcised," that their victory and triumph, are especially galling to his pious spirit. Do you remember to whom he before applied the term?

MARY. Oh! yes, to Goliath, when he was yet a boy; but he had lived among them since.

MAMA. Not from choice, you will remember nor longer than he could possibly help;—witness his pathetic exclamation, "Woe is me, that I sojourn in Mesech, and dwell in the tents of Kedar!"

But is it the heathen foes, of whose ferocity and ill-will he had personal experience, on whom he longs to visit the slaughter of his friends?

MARY. No; he wishes the very "mountains of Gilbon might want dew and rain, for witnessing their disgrace.

MAMA. Yes; for such the "casting away," in despair, of the "shield"—especially of a king, or leader,—was considered by all ancient nations. But as if a hand of even the implied reflection, on the andoubted bravery of Saul, which his words might be held to convey,—he immediately adds to his well-earned tribute to the valour of Jonathan, "And the sword of Saul returned not empty." Nay, he combines, and as it were, embalms their joint memories, in one never-to-be forgotten verse;—expressive alike, of generous oblivion of injuries in the grave, and envy of their happiness in thus dying together.

MARY. That is very kind, and like David. But he surely could not think Saul had really been "lovely in his life."

Mama. Seen through the vista of the tomb, Mary, there are few with whom we have been closely connected—whose failings, and even vices, do not come softened on our recollection. David did not forget that there was a period, (a brief one, alas!) when Saul, as the anointed of the Lord, was "goodliest" among his brethren in Israel; or that, to his early patronage, he himself owed fame and distinction, and relationship to his beloved Jonathan; towards whom, at least, we have every reason to think, (from the influence enjoyed by the latter, over his mind, and his sacrificing to filial duty, even his love for David) Saul had generally shewn himself a kind and "pleasant" parent.

But, when the "daughters of Israel" have been summoned to weep, for the lost munificence of him, (whom they once offended, by exalting at his expense, the modest shepherd conqueror)—let us mark, how suddenly and naturally, the personal grief of David—long incumbered and repressed by images of fallen royalty,—breaks out into passionate exclamations at the mention of the name of Jonathan. What is it, in these few simple words, "I am distressed for thee, my brother,"—which makes them stir the heart, as if we too, had lost the friend of our bosom—one "pleasant" to ourselves, as the generous and devoted Jonathan?

MARY. Mama, I always feel ready to cry, when I read them, just as if I had known him. I suppose it is because the words are so very short and true.

MAMA. You have just felt,—as the youngest perhaps, do most readily—that in truth and simplicity, lies the secret of that exquisite pathos, which has no parallel except in the Bible, and which all antiquity might be ransacked in vain to rival.

And as language would fail to add one pang to the grief which these four simple words have sufficed to convey to every feeling heart,—so would all the polish and refinement of modern times, stricin vain to add finish to a picture of friendship, whose tenderness and delicacy is carried to the uttermost, by being exalted beyond even female love and devotion.

And now, from the painful participation in a sorrow, which every one feels to be almost personal—it is a relief to escape once more into the vagueness of general regret, for the loss of the "valiant," and for national calamity. But I scarcely think I should have disturbed the current of emotions, so pleasing and profitable in their very pain, by any further reading to-day, had not our second chapter recorded a further testimony of the affectionate respect and regard of David, to the memory of his fallen foc.

By whom did we find the charitable office of interring the remains of Saul and his sons, to have been performed? MARY. The "men of Jabesh Gilead." We have surely heard of them before, somewhere.

MAMA. That you have. We read together on a former occasion, of that signal deliverance from a cruel foe, which Saul wrought for them; and for which they now, at the distance of twenty years, shewed such proper and praise-worthy gratitude. They were threatened by a king of "Ammon," with the loss of their right eyes, if not relieved by a certain day; a fate from which they were rescued by the valour and promptitude of him, whose inanimate relies they now rescued from birds of prey, and wild beasts, and the yet more cruel indignities of cruel heathen fores.

How did David shew his sense of this kindness, and requite it, as done to himself?

MARY. He prayed for a blessing from God on them, and promised them his favour and protection; and told them not to be disheartened, because their master Saul was dead, and the people had anointed him king.

MAMA. Very distinctly told, and an incident honourable to all parties.

But what circumstance, more praise-worthy still, is recorded of David, at the beginning of this chapter? MARY. He would not even choose a city out of his own tribe to live in, without enquiring of the Lord; and God told him to go to "Hebron." I always thought he reigned from the first at Jerusalem, but you told me it was a "Jebusite" town, till he took it long after.

Mama. And till that event transferred the royal residence to the spot originally "chosen" by Jehovah, to "put his name there"—no place could have been more eligible for David's capital than "Hebron;" sanctified by the sepulchre of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and situated in the very midst of Judah, and in the possession of the family of those priests, who had long been among his most faithful and attached followers.

But though now reigning in undisputed sovereignty over his own tribe, did David step peaceably into the possession of the whole kingdom of Israel?

MARY. By no means, Mama. Abner took Ishbosheth, Saul's son, and made him king over a great many tribes,—indeed, I see it says, "all Israel."

MAMA. But,—even could any thing have justified Abner's setting up one of a rejected race, in opposition to the declared will of God, in anointing David,—was Ishbosheth the rightful successor to the crown of Saul?

MARY. I suppose he was, Mama; for you know Jonathan was dead, and two other sons of Saul besides; was this not the next heir?

MAMA. No; there yet lived one, whose claim to the crown by rightful inheritance was indisputable, viz.—Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan; though his tender age, (only five years,) and a lameness, contracted by a fall in the sudden flight of his nurse, unfitted him for seconding the ambitious views of Abner. Of David's kindness to this feeble and helpless offspring of his beloved friend, we shall hear amply hereafter.

But whither, in the meantime, did Abner or rather Saul's army, which still acknowledged him as its general, carry the usurping king?

MARY. To "Mahanaim." Where was that?
MAMA. A place beyond Jordan, famous in sacred history for the appearance of angels to Jacob; but most likely chosen by Abner for security both from the Philistines, and from David.

Did the army remain quietly there?

MARY. No. Abner and some of his men went to Gibcon, and met Joab and some of David's people; and Abner purposed that they should "play before them:" but it turned out any thing but play; for they all killed each other. Was it a piece of treachery in Abner, or did he not intend it?

MAMA. This is uncertain; but it is seldom that the martial sports of parties so hostile, end amicably; and the slaughter, (whether designed or accidental,) was the cause of a bloody battle, in which Abner and the men of Israel, the original promoters of the affair, were worsted.

But what individual on David's side, owed his fate to his own rashness and obstinacy?

MARY. One of the "sons of Zeruiah."

MAMA. And who was she?

MARY. David's sister, you told me before. Was this the same bold man who went with him into Saul's camp?

MAMA. No; that was "Abishai," the elder. But in daring, "Asahel" seems to have resembled him; and it is creditable to Abner, (Joab's determined foe and rival,) that he seems to have reluctantly inflicted a doom so recklessly provoked. He seems also to have felt anxious to put an end to the civil strife; of which, however, (as Joab's rather obscurely translated speech reminds him,) he had been the original cause. The result of the battle, we find from the numbers slain on both sides, to have been highly favourable to the party of David; which we learn from the following chapter,—(evidently belonging to, and closing the transactions of this)—"waxed stronger and stronger, and the house of Saul weaker and weaker."

But there is a deeper lesson to be learned from the long and painful struggles by which it pleased God to exercise the faith and submission of him, whom twenty years before, he had anointed king over Israel. It may serve as an apt type of the gradual advance, amid trials and discouragements, of the Christian towards his heavenly crown. At times a desponding outcast from the kingdom to which, nevertheless, his "title standeth sure;" persecuted and harassed by the "prince of the world;" and even when partially put in possession of his purchased inheritance, still, amid fightings without and fears within," toiling his way in the might of the Lord his God towards the celestial Zion, where at length his reign shall be complete.

MORNING TWELFTH.

Lesson.—2d Samuel, Chapters iii. and iv.

MAMA. We shall have frequent and melancholy occasion, my dear Mary, to refer to the enumeration (no idle one) with which our reading commences, of the sons born to David, previous to, or during his sojourn at Hebron. These six young men, who,-had they been the offspring of one mother, and as such, brought up in fraternal union and concord, might have realized his own beautiful expression, that children "are like arrows in the hand of a giant," and that "happy is the man who hath his quiver full of them,"were most of them destined, by their equally unnatural loves and hatreds—their domestic dissension, and rebellion against their common parent, to embitter, to the very uttermost, the declining years of David: and to become, in the hands of the Lord, the ministers of his predicted and merited chastisement. Of Amnon, and Absalom, and Adonijah, such were their various enormities, it might have been said, in the emphatic words of Job, "cursed be the day in which a man-child saw the light," or, in the yet more solemn ones of our Lord, "it had been better for them they had never been born;" while of the happily obscurer offspring, whose births are here registered, not one trait of filial or public virtue has given their names a place in the records of piety or patriotism.

As the great and crowning sins of David arose from the violation of the relative ties, we shall have abundant cause to acquiesce in the just retribution of God, which made use of these very ties as instruments of his rightful anger.

How strongly indeed does the very next verse impress on us the evils and inconveniencies of polygamy; when we find that a quarrel between Ishbosheth and Abner, about one of the inferior or handmaid wives of his late father,—nearly cost the former his crown, and the latter (from the jealousy it gave rise to in Joab, though more indirectly) his life.

MARY. It was surely very foolish in Ishbosheth to quarrel with the man who had made him king.

MAMA. Not prudent, certainly, but extremely natural; as the wives of deceased sovereigns were esteemed sacred, and to aspire to them, (as you will find by various instances in the following history) washeld equivalent to pretending to the crown.

But could any supposed affront justify Abner's treachery to the man whom he had placed on his perilous throne?

MARY. Oh! no. But I suppose God overruled his anger, to bring Israel round at last, to obey David.

MAMA. Precisely; while Abner evidently palliated to himself his baseness, by affecting a new-born zeal for fulfilling God's decree. But while treasons may be overruled for good, it is seldon that traitors prosper: and we shall see that the defection of Abner was requited by an act of treachery deeper still.

Whether the demand made to Ishbosheth at this time for the restoration of his sister, David's wife, was suggested by Abner, as a pretext for an attack, or the result of affection for his first courageous partner, we do not know; but it was unhesitatingly complied with by one who durst refuse nothing sanctioned by Abner.

MARY. Mama! one cannot help being sorry for her new husband, who "went weeping behind ber all the way." I wonder if she was sorry to leave him.

MAMA. That she was in some measure estranged from David, her scoffing shortly after at his pious demeanour before the ark, seems to prove; though the pride, indicated by that circumstance, leads us to suppose she would gladly return from privat life to be the sharer of a throne.

But what was the disastrous sequel to the feast which David made for Abner and his followers, in honour of Michal's restoration, and of his own tardy allegiance?

MARY. Joab, who had been away on an expedition, came back just as it was over, and Abner gone; and he pretend 'to send after him in the king's name, and took 'm aside "to speak with him quietly," and killed him, to revenge his brother Asahel. Mama! what a shocking piece of treachery!

Mama. Yes, Mary—proceeding as it evidently did, far less from indignation at his brother's justly provoked fate in battle, than from selfish jealousy, and dread of the rising influence with David, of one so powerful as Abner. But where is now that boasted power? The man who could transfer at his pleasure, the allegiance of the tribes of Israel—five minutes conference with an unprincipled rival, sufficed to reduce to a heap of senseless clay. So weak are the instruments in themselves when their purpose is fulfilled—whoin God makes use of, for the furtherance of his greatest designs!

Was the murder of their favourite general, permitted to alienate from David, the returning affections of the Israelites?

MARY. No; they saw he had no hand in it, when he wishe all manner of bad things on account of it, to Joah, his own sister's son. This was not right, was it?

MAMA. Imprevations of all kinds are utterly repugnant to our juster notions of christian love and for hearance; but nothing could be more shocking to an upright mind, than possible involvment in a crime so foreign to its nature as treachery; and David's name you know, had been used to betray Abner.

By what tokens, more honourable and becoming than curses, did David demonstrate the reality of his regret?

MARY. He made all the people, and even Joab—"rend their clothes, and put on sackcloth," and he himself followed the bier, and lifted up his voice, and wept for Abner.

But what does he mean by asking if he had "died as a fool dieth?" Was that because it was foolish of him to be taken in by Joab?

MAMA. The word "fool" here, my dear, as elsewhere applied by David, "the fool hath said in his heart there is no God"—means a wicked person, or transgressor; and if Abner had been such (David reasons) he would have justly died the death of an evil-doer; whereas he fell—as the best and wisest may do—a victim to the envy of an assassin.

MARY. Oh! I understand this now. But I don't quite understand why the people came urging David to take meat; and were so pleased when he would not. What had they to do with it?

MAMA. It was a kind and considerate custom among the Jews, after a funeral, not only to visit the "the house of mourning," but even to carry provisions with them; in case the grief of the inmates should have led them to neglect their bodily wants. It forms a pretty and primitive incident in ancient manners, that this friendly solicitude should have been extended even to a king; and his declining to break, till sunset, the fast, which was a token of respect as well as sorrow for the memory of the deceased—confirmed the people's belief in the innocence of their beloved monarch; whose popularity we find was providentially increased, by the very event which threatened to overthrow it.

Take particular notice, Mary, of the complaind uttered, (at the very time of the guilt of Joab,) by his scarcely yet established sovereign, of his inability to punish as he deserved, his too powerful nephew; because it has been overlooked when accusing of treacherous cruelty the recommendation given by David to Solomon, to visit this and his other crimes with that merited retribution, which, even now he predicts, was awaiting the "doer of evil, according to his wickedness," from the Lord.

But oh! Mary, how fertile a parent is crime! and how easily does one act of cowardly cruelty pave the way for another! No sooner did certain was orthy servants about the person of the son of Saul, learn that by the death of Abner, their master was deprived of his chief support, than they hastened to purchase, as they thought, the favour of David, by his assassination.

Who were these justly disappointed traitors?

MARY. They were "captains of bands," and ought to have been above murdering their master.

MAMA. But what circumstances of tribe and country, aggravated their guilt?

MARY. They were "Benjamites," and so were Saul, and Ishbosheth his son. Is that what you mean?

MAMA. Yes; and what has been considered et more flagrant in their ingratitude, is that "Beeroth," their native city, was originally inhabited by Gibeonites; massacred and dispossessed by Saul, on purpose to make way for his favoured relations of "Benjamin."

In what defenceless state, did these recreant warriors surprise and slay their lord?

MARY. When he was lying on a bed at noon, in the heat of the day. Mama! the king of Moab, Eglon, was killed just at the same time; but he was a heathen tyrant, and the man that slew him a stranger, so it was not half so shocking. Why did these two people here pretend they were "fetching wheat?"

MAMA. It has been supposed they availed themselves of the pretext either of supplying the king's house with grain, or more probably, carrying some thence for the support of their soldiers; because a "sack" or bag, afforded the best means of conveying undiscovered their disgraceful trophy, the head of his rival, to the camp of David.

But did it produce there the expected effect?

MARY. Oh! no. David took God to witness, "who had redeemed him out of all his adversity," that as he had put to death the man who only pretended to have killed Saul, much more would he "take away from the earth" those who had "slain a righteous person, in hi own house, on his bed." This was quite right of David. But why did he "cut off their hands and feet?"

MAMA. In compliance with an eastern custom. by which the offending members of criminals in the employ of the state, are still exposed before the palace gates, in Turkey and elsewhere. And never could this mark of reprobation be more justly put, than on the murder-stained hands, and "feet swift to shed blood," of these least pitiable of all conspirators.

Our reading to-day, Mary, has been of a dark and fearful complexion, a record of treachery and blood, unredeemed except by the genuine pity, and virtuous indignation of David.

To dwell on the former would be unprofitable; but the latter affords a striking and humiliating contrast to the subsequent feelings and conduct of one, whom a kingdom could not now bribe to connive at assassination, yet whom a temptation, incalculably less powerful, involved, a few short years after, in personal guilt of the same atrocious character. Oh! how should the admonition of "Be not high minded but fear," and "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall," be impressed on our minds by the parallel between David, a mourner at the head of his late

, and the executioner of the assassins of his rival in the kingdom—and the same David, it wailing himself of the known villainy of the "bloody son of Zeruiah," to devote to destruction his most faithful servant and soldier!

Let it be a sad but wholesome warning, that no original disposition, however noble and engaging, no instances of generosity, however splendid, secure the unaided "natural man" against the inroads of sin and Satan; when he who avenged murder in others by condemning them to wear the involuntary garb of mourning, lived to exclaim, in "sackcloth and ashes," "Lord, deliver me from blood guiltiness, and hide thy face from my sins!"

MORNING THIRTEENTH.

Lesson.—1st Chronicles Chapter xi. to verse 9. Chapter xii. from 23d verse. Chapter xiii.

MAMA. The passages, which the more than usual inversion in the order of events recorded in them, will oblige us to select and re-arrange from the chapters before us—contain three of the most important incidents in the history of David; viz. his elevation at Hebron to be king over all Israel—his conquest and occupation of Jerusalem—and his transfer to that place, of the ark of God, from Kirjath-jearim, where you know it had remained since its return from the hands of the Philistines.

The first event, in order of time, as well as of our reading, is the resort to him of the tribes, set at liberty from their allegiance, by the murder of hoposheth.

What was the consequence of this wicked action, so sincerely disapproved, and justly punished by David?

MARY. All Israel gathered themselves to David to Hebron—saying, "Behold we are thy bone and thy flesh,"—and they remembered that even in Saul's time, he had "led them out," and that God had "appointed him to feed his people Israel."

MAMA. Yes; in that capacity of a good shepherd, with which his previous life had made him well acquainted; whose duty was not only to provide sustenance, but protection for the flock entrusted to his care—as had been early typified by his slaying (in the strength of his God) the lion and the bear.

By what solemn transaction was his public anointing—the former one in his father's house having been private—as king over Israel, preceded?

MARY. He "made a covenant with the elders of Israel, before the Lord." I suppose he promised to govern them well, and they in return, to serve him faithfully.

MAMA. Most probably; and so has this "covenant" been generally understood. But before passing on to the event, narrated in the next verse (though evidently subsequent to all the transactions at Hebron) let us finish these, by referring to the 23d verse of our second chapter; in which are specified the numbers of each tribe, who appeared on this memorable occasion, to give in their adhesion to the new monarch of "all Israel"—or, in the more impressive language of scripture—to "turn the kingdom of Saul to him, according to the word of the Lord."

Of this enumeration—highly interesting in its details to the nation itself-we need notice only two or three remarkable particulars. First, how extremely inferior in point of mere numerical strength were the children of Judah chosen by God, to airord a lawgiver to Israel-to the mighty armies sent forth by the tribes of Ephraim, Reuben, Ashur, and others, adhering till lately to the party of Saul-clearly proving that it was of the Lord alone, that one of the "least among the families of Israel," should by common consent, he elevated to rule over the rest. Nor was it less remarkable that this providential arrangement should be sanctioned by the presence and concurrence of the very kindred of Saul; while that monarch had yet a surviving grandson, in the person of the infant Mephibosheth.

But, to estimate aright the power and greatness of Him who could dispose this vast multitude to unite with "one heart" in fulfilling His design of making David king, we have only slightly to compute its numbers, amounting to upwards of two hundred and thirty thousand men, of different families and pursuits—separated by mountains, and deserts, and rivers—but all trained to arms, and disciplined by perpetual wars to a perfect knowledge of their own strength. Well might David, in the exultation of his heart, spread before them a three-days' banquet, prepared by the liberality of their brethren, in commemoration of an event, by which their long fraternal strife was happily cemented, and (in the figurative language used by themselves at the beginning of our chapter) all the tribes at length united as "one fold, under one shepherd!" Well indeed might there be "joy in Israel" at a union so long deferred and desirable; and which none but Almighty power and wisdom were competent to bring about!

We must now revert to the first of our chapters, verse 4th, to follow up the important conquest, achieved by David and the yet undispersed armies of "all Israel," who had assembled to crown him at Hebron.

Was this latter the place originally fixed in the eternal counsels of God, for the seat of temporal and spiritual government over his people?

MARY. Oh! no; that was Jerusalem. No wonder David was anxious to take it, as soon ās he possibly could, from the heathen Jebusites!

MAMA. And of what important part of it did he first obtain possession?

Mary. The castle of "Zion," where he afterwards lived, so that it was called "the city of David." This was a particularly holy place, Mama, was it not?

MAMA. David so styles it, my dear, in prophetic words, when speaking in the person of the Almighty. "Thus have I set my king on my holy hill of Zion." But the peculiar sanctity to which you allude, is that which it has acquired, as the type a d symbol of the purer church above, the "heave dy Zion," into which "nothing shall enter that defileth, or that worketh abomination, or maketh a lie;" though (like the literal Jerusalem) its precincts here below, are descerated by a mixture of "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel."

How did these proud Canaanites defy the armies of the Lord, and his anointed, or (in the Psalmist's own expressive words), did the "heathen rage, and imagine a vain thing?"

MARY. They said he should not come into their town.

MAMA. Yes; and the parallel place of 2d Samuel, adds the insulting mockery, that the very "blind and lame" among them, should suffice to repel the besiegers. By whose valour was this idle boast signally falsified?

MARY. Joab, David's nephew. He "went up first," and was made "chief" for it, and repaired the rest of the city. But David, it says, built "round about from Millo;" where was that?

MAMA. The situation of "Millo," an armoury or fortified building, subsequently erected by Solomon, is supposed to have been between Mount Zion, the residence of the kings, and Mount Moriah, the site of the temple; over the whole of which intervening valley, the town built by David, gradually spread.

But by whose gracious protection was he enabled thus to strengthen and extend his power?

MARY. "The Lord of Hosts was with him, and so he waxed greater and greater."

MAMA. And of this Almighty protector we have now to find proof (in the third of our chapters) that David was not unmindful. What was the first step taken by him to fulfil God's ancient purpose, of "putting his name" at Jerusalem?

MARY. He consulted all his "captains," and the "congregation," whether they should not gather all their brethren everywhere, to "bring again the ark of God."

MAMA. This was certainly the general purport of the consultation; but you have omitted two important and characteristic particulars;—see if you can pick them out.

MARY. Oh! yes, it was only to be done, "if it be of the Lord our God." That was like David, who, I daresay, would "enquire of the Lord" before he did it. But what was the other thing you meant?

MAMA. The summoning of "priests and lacvites," to preside at, and assist in the sacred office of removal; which could only by their ministry be lawfully accomplished.

Was the proposition agreeable to the people, as well as pleasing to God?

MARY. Yes, it was "right in all their eyes." It could hardly be otherwise, Mama.

Mama. And yet, Mary, this same "people," so ready, when rightly guided, to acquiesce in the power and necessity of religion—had been content to remain in culpable ignorance of, and indifference to, their best interests, during the whole irreligious reign of Saul; at a distance from the symbol of God's visible presence, and destitute of the power of ascertaining His will. Let this teach us the inestimable value of those appointed means of grace, which bring, as it were, the "testimony" of God home to every heart and dwelling; from which, it is to be feared, without such gracious provision, the "form," as well as "power" of godliness would long since have passed away!

Where had the ark of "God the Lord, that dwelleth between the cherubim," remained, during the dark and disastrous period, now about to give place to happier times?

MARY. At "Kirjath-jearim," you know; where the Philistines sent it home in such a hurry; and David, and all Israel, went there to fetch it; and it says they "played before God, with all their might, and with singing, and harps, and trumpets."

MAMA. So far, all was piety and joy. But by what grievous omission in the appointed order of march, was the solemn procession "troubled," and the general rejoicing converted into terror and mourning?

MARY. The ark was put upon a "new cart," and when the oxen "stumbled," and one of the men that drove it, put out his hand to hold it steady, God was angry and slew him. Mama! pray make this plain, for it has often puzzled me. The Philistines sent home the ark in a cart drawn by "milch-kine," and nothing happened.

MAMA. To the ignorant heathens, acting to the best of their judgment, nothing certainly But have you forgotten the Bethshemites slain to the number of seventy, for unauthorized curiosity, in "looking into" the ark, sacred as they ought to have known, to the priests of God alone. Had these, as well as the Levites, whose special office it was, to bear aloft on their shoulders, the symbol of Jehovah's presence, been employed (as David's intended summons led us to expect) in its removal—the threatened accident which occasioned the apparently innocent officiousness of Uzza, would never have occurred. Do you know who the youth, who thus became an expiatory victim for the transgression of God's law, was?

M:.. No; not a priest or Levite of course, else he would not have been "cut off."

MAMA. He was one of the sons of "Abinadab," whose "house on the hill" near Kirjath-jearim, had now for forty-six years been hallowed by the residence of the ark of God; and brother to Eleazar (perhaps new no more) who had originally been "sanctified," we are told or set apart, for its peculiar care. From him, or from the prophet Samuel, who only about twenty years before, had presided at a solemn fast, observed before the exiled "Testimony of Israel"—the rash young man, who put forth his hand to an unauthorised office, might have learned deeper impressions of its awful sanctity.

MARY. So he might, Maina; and at all events David must have known better. I wonder he could be "displeased" at any thing God did!

MAMA. There is surely nothing, my dear, in the mention of this displeasure (which has scandalized others besides yourself) to lead us to think it was sinfully directed against Him who "cannot err." David, from what we know of him, was far more likely to be "grievously vewed" (which is what the word implies) with himself, as the indirect author of the sin, and its consequent judgment. And that such were his natural feelings of mingled awe and humiliation on the occasion, may, I think, be distinctly gathered from his relinquishment (as unworthy) of his fond design of triumphantly bearing to his own home, a symbol too sacred to allow unhallowed contact. I never can look on this change in the purposes of David, by which one of the proudest objects of his life was temporarily frustrated, in any other light than that of a penitent sacrifice for not having, as a monarch, enforced more strictly the known law of God. This will be fully corroborated (if not proved) by his altered conduct on its next removal.

Where was it, in the meantime, humbly deposited?

MARY. At the house of "Obed-Edom, the Gittite." Who was he?

MAMA. A Levite, and as such, an authorized guardian of the sacred symbol. By what gracious token was the temporary appointment ratified?

Mary. The Lord "blessed Obed-Edom, and all that he had," the three months that the ark remained with him.

MAMA. Let us learn, my dear child, from this consoling expression, that he who, in vindication of his honour, is mighty to punish, is no less mighty, and far more willing, to bless. For the violated encitiv of the law of God, one only, the transgressor himself, suffered; while, to mark (when halv reverenced) its healing and benignant characte, blessings were showered on a whole privileged household. If thus it was with the "two tables of stone," containing the strict and unbending precepts of the Mosaic covenant-how much more will the blessed Gospel, received and cherished in the heart, shed abroad there a peace, a joy, and a blessedness, before which, the temporal prosperity of Obed-Edom, great as it was, must sink into nothing!

MORNING FOURTEENTH.

Lesson—1st Chronicles, Chapter xv.—Psu!ra lxviii.—1st Chronicles, Chapter xvi.

MAMA. I think we shall have cause to see and acknowledge, in the beginning of this day's reading, not only the justice of the view I adopted, of the penitential feelings of David under God's recent chastisement, but the truth of my former observations on the immediate and practical reformation by which his errors, both public and private, were uniformly followed.

By what increase of respect and considerateness (independently of the acknowledgement of the exclusive right of the Levites to be its bearers) do we find his second intended removal of the ark characterised?

MARY. He "prepared a place" now, Mama, and "pitched a tent" for it.

MAMA. Highly proper, and indeed indispensable preliminaries, since—partly from remaining awe and more probably from his now formed design of building a permanent temple—he still declined conveying it, as once intended, to his own pulace.

Having assembled on this second occasion, not only, as before, "all Israel"—but the children of Aaron and the Levites, according to their appointed families—what pious injunction does he lay on them for the future, and in what humble terms does he aknowledge and deplore the past?

MARY He bade them "sanctify themselves," that they might "bring up the ark of the Lord God of Israel;" and said, it was because they "had not done it at the first, nor sought God after the due order," that he had "made a breach upon them."

MAMA. Bear in mind, my dear, these solemn words, if ever, in these times of change and innovation, you should hear the "sanctification" of God's ministers, and that "due order" in their ministrations, the omission of which called forth a summary judgment, characterized as things of little moment.

The Mosaic ritual, it is true, has had its use, and passed away; but grievously are they mistaken, who suppose, that with it has passed away, "one jot or tittle," of the reverence due to, or exacted by the Majesty of Heaven! Nay, if the sacredness of the preparatory law, which "came by the ministry of angels," was so awfully and uniformly vindicated,—is it to be imagined, that the "word of life," which, in latter times, was "spoken by the Son of God," is to be rashly tampered with, by unauthorized hands—or propped, when in supposed jeopardy, by unhallowed expedients?

Of the insufficiency of such to give it support, in the eyes at least, of the pious David—we have a striking acknowledgement in the 26th verse, to which (passing over the enumeration of the singers and musicians) we may now turn. What is there devoutly said of the succour and strength vouchsafed by God to his appointed servants?

MARY. "And it came to pass, when God helped the Levites that bare the ark of the covenant, that they offered seven bullocks and seven rams."

MAMA. Yes; in grateful acknowledgement of that Almighty guidance and protection, which not only directed and supported their toilsome steps, with their precious burden, along the steep craggy ascent to Zion,—but preserved them during the progress, from any participation in, or repetition of the guilt of Uzza. In a similar spirit, Mary, does every pious minister, still ascribe to the grace and mercy of his God, not only the success with which it may please that God to crown his labours,—but his own preservation from being carried away by the errors peculiar to his calling, and his guidance in that "path of life," from which, even while pointing it out to others, some have themselves been fatally estranged.

For what striking visible symbol of purity and sacredness, did the sacred Psalmist of Israel, in token of humility, exchange his usual robes of state; while joining, or more probably leading, the choir of Levites employed in the praises of God?

MARY. "A robe of fine linen, and a linen ephod." Could any but priests wear these?

MAMA. Not on ordinary occasions, certainly; but the assumption of them in this instance, by David, so far from indicating pride or presumption, was evidently directed by a far nobler feeling,-that of testifying in how much higher honour, he held the character of the humblest servant of God, than that of the mightiest earthly monarch. And this humility it was, (indicated by his relinquishment for the day, of his royal trappings) which so outraged the pride, and pro--ked the contempt of Saul's haughty daughter; and gave rise, from her scornful comments recorded in the parallel place of the book of Samuel-to the unfounded jests of infidel blasphemers, on the supposed "nakedness" and shamcless exposure of David while leading the choral dance, in honour of that very Being, by whose ceremonial law even accidental indecorum during sacred ordinances, was strictly guarded against and who, we cannot for a moment doubt, would have avenged any such profanation, by a judgment more terrible still, than the recent one on Uzza.

And now, Mary, studiously as I have refrained, during our conversations, from availing myself, otherwise than indirectly, of the writings of the many learned persons, whose able comments might, perhaps have advantageously superseded your mother's desultory remarks—I think it would be cruel to deprive you of the gratification I have myself received, from the adaptation, by a skilful expositor, of the 68th Psalm, (expressly called in its title, "A prayer in removing the ark,") to the successive stages of its journey, to its ultimate rest in Zion.

Little, perhaps, did those who originally subjoined to many of the delightful hymns of David, the then well-known occasions on which they were composed,—imagine the extent of obligation under which they were laying worshippers like ourselves, of a distantage; by the enhanced pleasure and edification, arising from beholding the interesting events of the life of the writer, reflected, as it were, in the yet more interesting mirror of these pious and affecting compositions.

Let us turn then, in the first place, to the 68th Psalm, and mark the peculiar adaptation of its very commencement, to the occasion for which it was composed, viz. the removal of the ark. Are you aware that the precise words with which it opens, had acquired—from consecration for ages to the same I. llowed office—a peculiar sacredness?

MA.... No, Mama. What made them so proper and holy?

Mana. Their express use by Moses, the inspired lawgiver of God's people, every time, when, during their protracted wanderings, the ark of His glory was lifted up for removal, by its appointed bearers. And it is characteristic of the humility, as well as piety of David, that he should now have adopted these words of ancient sanctity, in preference to the loftiest flights of his own more recent inspiration. How indicative, too, of the true spirit of religion, is the lead here given (as in the unrivalled prayer of his illustrious "Seed") to fervent aspirations for the advancement of the glory and honour of Jehovah's kingdom and devout acknowledgements of his universal and particular providence!

These extending to the 7th verse, are supposed to have been sung during the preliminary adjustment of the ark, on the shoulders of the Levites; while, on the commencement of the procession, followed the more exclusively national praises, for rescue from Egyptian bondage, and guidance through the wilderness, contained in the noble words, "O God, when thou wentest forth before thy people, when thou didst march in the wilderness, the earth shook, the heavens dropped at the presence of God; even Sinai itself, was moved at the presence of God—the God of Israel."

Could any expressions be selected, more suitable to revive the dormant gratitude for deliverance of a too forgetful people, and deepen their reverence for its long neglected national symbol?

MARY. No, indeed, Mama; I shall always care much more for this psalm, now that I know when David made it.

MAMA. That, my dear, you might have "known" long since, from the title it bears in your Bible. But that its minute application to so grand an event, as the triumphant inauguration of the "King of kings," by a whole awakened people,—should lend it fresh interest in your eyes, is the object of my thus, I hope inseparably, associating them in your memory.

These appropriate references to the benefits conferred by the ark, in its former "journeyings," are supposed to have lasted till the procession came in view of Mount Zion, its chosen and future residence; where commenced the equally appropriate strains, exalting (at verse 15th) that highly favoured "hill," above those hitherto most conspicuous in Israel, and rebuking their supposed envy at its superior distinction; the word, to "leap," applied to them, being said more correctly to express "couching" in malice or revenge, like exasperated beasts of prey.

The succeeding verses, beginning, "Thou hast ascended up on high, thou hast led captivity captive," &c. &c. are by many supposed to indicate the period of the actual ascent of the ark to the "holy mountain;" and were this the only "song of Zion," unanimously referred by the church, to the same joyful occasion,-the conjecture would be abundantly probable. descriptive as is the whole residue of this psalm, in the highest degree, of the present solemnity, (to the very minute details of the relative position in the sacred procession, of the singers, musicians, and "damsels with the timbrels," and the selection for enumeration, of four tribes, two of them the nearest, and two others the most remote from Jerusalem, by which the national unanimity is finely intimated) I think you will agree with me in regarding, as still more applicable to the entrance of the symbol of God's presence, into its appointed "rest," that noble hymn, the 24th psalm.

In this sublimest of human compositions, not only is the literal exaltation of the ark of God, to the "hill of the Lord," plainly alluded to,but the spiritual qualifications of those aspiring to worship before it, beautifully set forth. then, when with "clean hands, and a pure heart," it had been reverently borne thither-are the "gates" of the destined sanctuary-called upon to receive their Lord-in a strain of heavenly eloquence, which (especially when accompanied then, as in our own times, with solemn and appropriate harmony) thrills the very soul, and has made many a devout worshipper ready to exclaim, with Jacob, while listening to the angelic choir,-" Surely this is none other but the house of God, this is the gate of heaven!"

MARY. I always thought the beautiful words, "Lift up your heads, ye everlasting doors, and let the King of Glory come in," were written by David about Christ.

MAMA. I am the more glad you thought so, that the supposition is perfectly just, and recognised by the whole Christian church. The same may be said, with even greater force, of that part of the 68th psalm, about "leading captivity captive, and receiving gifts for men." But you are not now to learn, that the primary application of many Scripture prophecies, among others those in the Psalms, to events either present or less remote, does not in the least affect their ultimate reference to higher and more spiritual objects.

When David, in the warmth of parental partiality for his son Solomon, described his future reign, in colours too glowing far, for mortal domination -- he as little thought, perhaps, that he was unconsciously describing the King who was to "sit upon his throne, for ever and ever;' -as that when now celebrating the ascent of the ark, he was furnishing a song of future triumph, for the "ascension" of his glorified "Seed." Though the remarkable expression, (quoted to this very effect, by Christ himself, from one of the psalms) "The Lord said unto my Lord, sit thou on my right hand, until I make thy foes thy footstool," shews that David at times was favoured with prophetic glimpses of the real character and greatness of his illustrious descendant.

¹ To Him, and to his victories, and their triumphant result above, and inexpressible purchased blessings here below, let us habitually refer the many passages in the hymns we so much admire, which plainly transcend human might, or human exaltation. And let it deepen our gratitude, to reflect that the glory which David saw "afar off," and "through a glass darkly"—has in these latter times, been revealed, in its full brightness and benignity, to the humblest partakers in the "gifts received for men" by that conqueror, who has only "ascended up on high," to prepare for them a way to the Zion above.

We have left ourselves little leisure to notice minutely, the festal sacrifices offered by the gratitude of David, when the translation of the ark was happily accomplished,-the generous liberality to the poor, by which they were accompanied,-the yet more praiseworthy appointment of a permanent choir, to celebrate continually the praises of God, -or even the beautiful hymn, (chiefly compiled from the 96th, 105th, and 106th psalms) which David, on this joyful day, delivered to the chief singer Asaph-himself a distinguished proficient in sacred poetry. Its appropriateness to the occasion-eloquent appeals to the gratitude and feelings of the people-and reiterated expressions of heart-felt piety and praise-carry with them their own best commentary; and must find an echo in every heart, either duly instructed in the special providences towards Israel, to which it refers, or the more marvellous spiritual deliverance, of which their rescue was but a foretaste and a type.

Nor was the devotion thus expressed by David, left behind him, (as is the case with too many) on quitting the immediate presence of God. In what affecting words, is the whole account of this public commemoration closed?

MARY. "And David returned to bless his house."

MAMA. Yes, Mary; not only to bless it with his presence, as a wise and lenient governor, but (in the weal known scripture meaning of the phrase) to conclude, by presiding over the domestic worship of his family, the public services of the sanctuary; thus leaving an example which all, while they admire, may imitate. Few are privileged to erect, like David, a "tabernacle" for the reception of the visible presence of God; but under the humblest roof where "two or three are gathered together in his name, He has promised to be "in the midst of them;" and with such a promise vouchsafed, who would not resolve at once to make it his, and thus bring, like the ous monarch of Israel, a blessing on his house?

MORNING FIFTEENTH.

LESSON—1st Chronicles, Chapter xvii. 2d Samuel, Chapter 9th and 10th.

MAMA. The close of our yesterday's reading furnished an exemplary proof that the fervent devotion of David did not evaporate with the public solemnity, by which it was called forth. And we have, in the beginning of that of to-day, the result of those pious meditations with which it was still farther followed up.

Did the grateful monarch of Israel rest satisfied with having provided at length, a temporary shelter for the long exiled ark of God?

MARY. No. He was ashamed of dwelling in "an house of cedars" while it yet remained "under curtains." What did that mean, Mama?

MAMA. I should have sooner explained it, had I not imagined that you were sufficiently acquainted with the import of the word "tabe!" nacle," to be aware that it was merely a superior and more (rnamented species of tent; capable, like those, of being taken down, and folded up for removal, and speedily re-creeted—admirably adopted therefore for the migratory state of the ark and people of God in the wilderness—though now, in David's opinion, sadly inadequate and unsuited to the settled condition of Israel, both in church and state.

To whom did he communicate these pious misgivings?

MARY. To Nathan the prophet, who at first encouraged him,—the thing seemed so right and reasonable.

MAMA. Yes, Mary; though for wise reasons, dispensed with and over-ruled by God. Let us remark—as honourable to the veracity of Nathan (the supposed author of the second book of Samuel where the transaction is similarly recorded) and as a fresh instance of the strict truth which pervades all the narrations of the Bible—the candour with which the prophet relates the Almighty's revocation of the sanction he had rashly, and in mere human wisdom, pronounced?

What reasons was He pleased to assign for denying to David the gratification of his pious wishes?

MARY. That He had "not dwelt in an house, since the day He brought up Israel," but gone from tent to tent, and tabernacle to tabernacle." How was this Mama? I thought Moses made only one.

MAMA. Your question will afford us an example of the great utility of comparing parallel places of Scripture, and of the invaluable references in the margin of our Bibles—by which we are directed to the original words of 2d Samuel, and find there, "a tent and a tabernacle"—merely signifying (as both are identical) the pleasure of Jehovah to dispense hitherto, with a fixed earthly habitation.

Does such appear, however, to have been the continued purpose of Him whom the "Heaven of heavens cannot contain?"

MARY. No; for he says, to comfort David, that after his death, his son should "build Him an house." One cannot help wishing it had pleased God to let David do it, after taking him from the "sheep cote," and shewing him so much favour! Have you any idea why it was not allowed?

MAMA. When we have only conjectures, Mary, to guide us, in speculating on the decrees of Omnipotence—we cannot be too careful in hazarding them. One natural supposition, however—borne out by some hints of Scripture—is, that the perpetual wars and bloodshed, amid which the life of David was necessarily passed, unfitted him for that lengthened work of piety and peace, for the furtherance of which the enemies of Israel, during his son's more pacific reign, were miraculously restrained and subdued. But a sadder, and more obvious ground of unfitness, suggests itself to the heart of every one acquainted with the deplorable sequel of David's history; from which (had the omniscient Being to whom it was already present, seen meet then to reveal it by the mouth of his prophet) the king would, in his present holy frame, have recoiled, exclaiming like Hazael, "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this great thing?"

Be this as it may, the promises made, in reward of his hitherto unswerving allegiance to David—were such as amply to compensate for his disappointment; and fill his pious soul with overflowing gratitude.

What magnificent things are said of the unborn son, destined to fulfil, in due time, his father's accepted intention?

MARY. God was to "stablish his throne for ever"—and to "be his father and he should be his son"—and "settle him in his house and kingdom for ever."

MAMA. In whose "house and kingdom," Mary, (for your change of persons from the text, renders it doubtful)—David's? or the Lord's, who was then speaking?

MARY. Ah! I see it was God's. Surely this could not mean Solomon only; as he is dead long ago, and no king of his family reigns now at Jerusalem.

Mama. I am glad you perceived this, and the distinction between the temporal mercies abundantly showered on Solomon—and the eternal Sonship, and everlasting kingdom reserved for him, of whom it can alone be truly said thus he sitteth "on the throne of David, (his father, "according to the flesh,") for ever." Into the greatness of this mystery, the king, it is probable, was not yet permitted to penetrate. Yet how do his profuse, and heart-felt expressions of gratitude for mere temporal benefits conferred on himself and family, shame the cold reluctant acknowledgements of the Christian for richer mercies and a more enduring kingdom!

Whither did he instantly repair, to pour out these pious and praiseworthy feelings?

MARY. It says, he went, and "sat before the Lord." Did the Jews not kneel at their devotions, as we do?

MAMA. Probably not; as we hear chiefly in Scripture, of prostration on the face, in the more solemn periods of prayer; and the posture now assumed by the outwardly irreverent modern Jews, is standing. But this one here assigned to David is, according to the customs of the East, at this day—abundantly expressive of humility; and adopted by inferiors whenever their stay in a superior's presence becomes too long to admit of continued prostration. It is in fact, a half kneeling position; the knees being joined together, and the weight of the body resting on the heels.

But what assures us that it was not in posture alone, that David humbled himself before God?

MARY. He says, "Who am I, O Lord God, and what is mine house, that thou hast brought me hitherte?" Indeed he might well ask this, Mama, since (as God reminded him) he had been a poor shepherd boy, with no more chance of a kingdom than I have.

MAMA. And when in addition to that personal aggrandizement—sometimes conferred by valour or other circumstances, on obscure individuals in the East—he saw his honours rendered by the promise of God, not only hereditary but perpetual—how does a sense of undeserved favour swell and oppress his labouring heart, and oblige him to refer to the knowledge of that heart possessed by his Almighty Benefactor—for the feelings tiere, to express which, words were denied!

And oh! Mary, what a beautiful absence of selfishness is displayed in the readiness with which one so highly honoured, soon turns from the contemplation of individual to that of national benefits,—finding, like Moses, in the "good of his nation," his most congenial subject of exultation: subordinate only, as in the mind of Moses and every truly religious man, to the yet more paramount consideration, of the honour likely to accrue from all, to God!

How is this absorbing sentiment beautifully expressed at verse 24th?

MARY. "That thy name may be magnified for ever, saying, the Lord of Hosts is the God of Israel, even a God to Israel." Oh Mama! how good and right David's thoughts seem to be, since we took them to pieces so. I am not at all surprised he is called a "man after God's own heart," now that I know him better.

MAMA. And I shall be disappointed, if some measure at least, of this premature conviction, does not survive the knowledge (to which we are sadly advancing) of his painful backslidings. One inference at least, may be drawn from your unsophisticated avowal, viz. that if more intimate knowledge of his recorded words and actions has heightened your appreciation of the cruelly misrepresented king of Israel—the eye of Omnipotence may surely be permitted, unquestioned, to have discerned in him matter for compassion and even for acceptance, unrevealed (till the day when the "secrets of all hearts shall be judged") to the unpitying revilers of a sinner like themselves.

But what amiable trait of David's conduct occurs, in the second of our chapters, to confirm, if (as I suspect) it did not partly influence, your favourable estimate of his natural disposition?

MARY. His asking, as soon as he was fairly settled at Jerusalem, whether there was any one left of Saul's house, to whom he might "shew kindn s, for Jonathan's sake." Surely, Mama, he could not have known of Mephibosheth; else he would have been good to him, as Jonathan's child, from the first?

MAMA. Evidently not. For as we perceive, this feeble scion of a royal stock had hitherto remained in a distant retreat; the same probably to which his faithful nurse had fled with him, on the catastrophe of his family.

To whom did David, as yet in ignorance of the existence of one so endeared to him by hereditary friendship—apply, for the purpose of shewing gratuitous kindness to the house of his deceased enemy?

MARY. A servant of Saul's called Ziba, and he first told him of Mephibosheth. How glad David must have been!

MAMA. Yes, Mary, at once to fulfil a solemn engagement, entered into with his beloved and departed friend, and to extend his royal protection to one so interesting and helpless.

MARY. Mama! how striking, to see Saul's grandson falling on his face before David; and calling himself, out of humility, a "dead dog," just as David had done, years before, when speaking to Saul in the cave! It was quite right of him to make Jonathan's son cat at his own table, to shew his respect for his father's memory.

MAMA. To you and me, Mary, this seems only an act of natural and almost unavoidable courtesy. But if we consider for a moment the extreme jealousy with which, in eastern countries to this day, individuals even remotely connected with the throne, are regarded by him who fills it, and the wholesale massacres (amidst which mutilation, loss of eyes, and imprisonment for life are considered acts of elemency) involving often, like that of wicked Athaliah, "all the seed royal" of those unhappy lands-we shall more highly estimate the generosity which placed daily in view of the Jewish people, and on an apparent footing of equality with their elective monarch, the last scion of the once popular family of Saul.

But was the "kindness of God," as (from its having been ratified by an oath before Him) that shewn by David to Mephibosheth is beautifully called—confined to an affectionate reception, and a place at the king's table?

MARY. Oh no! David handsomely gave him back all the land that had been Saul's, and I suppose, because he was young, and lame, and not able to manage it properly, appointed Ziba to do it for him. This was really considerate, as well as kind.

MAMA. It was certainly thus intended; though the basest advantage was afterwards taken by this "unjust steward," to calumniate his absent lord, and secure the inheritance for himself. From what may we gather that he was already too powerful for a servant, and too probably enriched on the ruins of his late master's family?

MARY. It says he had "fifteen sons, and twenty servants." I fear they were too many for poor cripple Mephibosheth; but while he had the king's favour, no one could hurt him.

MAMA. No; and accordingly it was not till David was involved in his own misfortunes, that he became the victim of Ziba's treachery, as we hall see by and bye.

Besides weighter reasons for including in this day's reading, the next short chapter—I the more willingly do so, that it records another pleasing instance of David's friendly acknowledgement of past kindness. Towards whom was it manifested?

MARY. The son of Nahash, king of the Ammonites. How came David to have any thing to do with him?

MAMA. Scripture affords no precise answer to your question, which is the more natural, as the Ammonites were enemies to God's people, and Nahash, (if the same who so cruelly threatened the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead) a relentless tyrant. We perceive however, in the very defeat which he sustained on that occasion, at the hands of Saul—a likely motive to induce him to grant protection to David, while an exiled fugitive; and this was the "kindness" probably, of which he retained so creditable a recollection.

But what reception did his embassy of condolence experience from the young king of Ammon?

MARY. His people persuaded him they were 'spies,' and they used them ridiculously; shaving off half their beards, and cutting their clothes short. I think Mama, the people who did it, had more reason to be "ashamed" than David's men.

MAMA. You are not aware perhaps, of the prodigious importance, nay, almost sanctity of the "beard" in eastern countries; among the Jews especially, who were strictly forbidden to "mar its corners," even in token of grief for their nearest relations; and who, you see, here religiously abstained from taking off even the remaining portions, by which they were temporarily disfigured. As for the extent of the other affront, you would better estimate it, did you know how excessively scandalized Turks and other orientals are, to this day, by what they esteem the "shamefulness" of the Franks' short clothing, to wear which themselves would appear to them the depth of folly and degradation.

M : i understand now why they were so highly affronted. But what is meant by the children of Ammon seeing that they "stank" before David?

MAMA. That they had rendered themselves so justly odious and abhorrent to him, as to have no alternative but a bloody war; for a cause (their own conscience must have told them) the most idle and disgraceful. But what was the result of the great armament of "Syrians" and others whom they mustered in this unrighteous quarrel?

MARY. They were all defeated, and forty chusand killed; and the end of it was, that people were afraid to take their part any more, and David came out of it greater than ever.

MAMA. We have given a glance, though a cursory one, to this chapter, because with it concludes that happy era, (to which, alas! we must now bid adieu) during which David, as is said of good old Zechariah, "walked in the commandments and ordinances of God blamcless;" and when, as Job says of himself, during a similar privileged period-the "candle of the Lord shined on his head." Twenty years now had David reigned and prospered, subduing in the name and strength of his God, all his foreign enemies; uniting under his "righteous sceptre" the long scattered tribes of Israel; and (a brighter jewel still in his yet unstained crown)-" holding fast his integrity," "doing justly, loving mercy, and walking humbly with his God." We have now to learn, and seldom has the lesson been written in characters more bitter and humiliating-that " man in his own estate, is altogether vanity," that "there is none righteous, no not one," and that the heart (in its best natural condition) is "deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." All these humbling representations of humanity, (some of them his own,) David lived to verify. May we have cause to apply to the moral and spiritual effect on others of his sad miscarriage, the text which cheered the apostle under the lamentable apostacy of his beloved nation, " If the fall of them be the riches of the world, how much more their fulness?" Then, may we humbly ask, if the lapse into sin of David be held up, as it justly is, as a beacon to Christians of all ages—may not his exemplary contrition become a pattern and encouragement to many, in the difficult but not impracticable path, of "repentance unto life?"

MORNING SIXTEENTH.

LESSON .- 2d Samuel, Chapters xi. Psalm xxxviii.

MARY. Mama! I quite dreaded coming to read to-day, after what you said (and not without reason) about David's becoming wicked. How could be go so dreadfully wrong all at once?

MAMA. If you had followed, my dear, with the solemn attention with which it becomes us, ever to approach the darker and more painful chapters of the history of man as recorded in the Bible—the whole progress of this unhappy narration, you would have been aware that it was not "at once" that David proceeded to the utmost lengths of crime and cruelty; but that to one, apparently trivial act of indulgence in sinful curiosity, might be traced all the successive steps of an iniquit, from the consummation of which he would probably at its earlier stages, have himself shrunk with horror.

This is perhaps (to the young especially) the most instructive part of the sad history; and a practical comment on the scripture remark, "Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth;" and its yet more impressive admonition, to "resist the beginnings of evil."

To what unfortunate circumstance might the sinful passion of David for the wife of another (whom, according to the strict customs of the east regarding women, he would never otherwise have been permitted to behold) be attributed?

MAPY. To his seeing her bathing, while walking on the root of his house.

MAMA. And can any thing be more obvious than that, by the very trifling act of self-denial and sacrifice to decorum, of ceasing to take advantage of his elevated position to invade the privacy of a respectable woman, who concluded herself perfectly safe from observation the whole future tide of guilt and misery would have been cut off, as it were, at its very source?

But truly may it be said of "sin" as of "strife," that it is "as when one letteth out water,"—so rapidly and irresistibly does its flood increase, and at length sweep all before it!

-: MARY. Mama! I wonder, since David was wicked enough to covet another man's wife, and liked her so well, that he did not take her from her husband and keep her altogether. Saul took his daughters from their's, and gave them to other men, and Herod married his own brother's wife; and I daresay nobody would have hindered David from doing as he chose.

MAMA. I will tell you what hindered him. Not the "fear of God," for "He" evidently was not "in all his thoughts,"-but the fear of man. He was restrained by regard for his reputation as a godly person; and a strict observer of that Divine law, which he shrunk from openly violating, even while breaking in secret one of its most awful precepts. Mark this principle well at the outset; because in the attempt to reconcile his conduct as a sinner, with his established character as a professor of holiness, lies the only solution of the seeming fatality which impelled David to add crime to crime, from the vain hope of screening his own reputation, and that of the partner of his guilt. Uriah's may be the first recorded murder, unwillingly perpetrated for purposes of concealment: but thousands have been since committed on the same principle, by those who once shuddered, like David, at "blood-guiltiness," and at first contemplated no blacker sin than robberv.

Had David been a tyrant, regardless of God and man, like Saul, or Herod, he would no doubt have openly possessed himself of the sacred pledge, left to the safe keeping of his king and country by its absent defender. But though not afraid to "do this great wickedness, and sin before God;" he was afraid of the "reproach of men," either on himself or the poor victim of his unhallowed passion. Ney, more, as a zealous upholder of the strictness of the law of Moses, he durst not take upon him to screen her by his power, from the dreadful sentence to which it condemned her; and the execution of which, the high sense of the honour of Wriah, leads us to suppose he would have exacted. What was the punishment decreed by God on the convicted adultress?

MARY. Oh! Mama! she was to be stoned to death. You know the Jews in our Lord's time wanted to do so to a poor creature, and he would not let them.

MAMA. Nay, Mary; if our blessed Saviour, compassionate as he was, yet "obedient unto the law," and "fulfilling all righteousness," no farther exercised his absolving power in the poor sinner's favour, than by an appeal to the consciences of her self-convicted accusers—no wonder the earthly king, "set up" by God, expressly to maintain and enforce his law, durst not openly take the transgressor's part.

His great object thus became, to procure, if possible, (by any means, however disgraceful,) for the erring wife, the countenance of her unconscious husband; and had this been accomplished, the outward necessity for removing him by murder would have been obviated.

But would the bloody purpose have been the less surely recorded in the "book of His remembrance," who hath said that "whosoever hateth his brother in his heart, is a murderer already?" Doubtless not; and whether the injured husband had been worked upon to go to his house, which, from the most honourable and conscientious motives, he declined, or not-the stain of "bloodguiltiness," would equally, in the sight of God, have cleaved to the soul of David. His chastisement and penitence might not, however, in the former case, have been so edifyingly displayed in the eyes of men; and, therefore, no doubt his guilt was permitted to assume the hideous and visible shape of treacherous and deliberate assassination.

MARY. Mama! It makes me sick! I had far rather David had done like Saul, and "cast a javelin" at once at good Uriah, than put him in front of the battle, and bid them leave him to be killed.

MAMA. I do not wonder, Mary, at your youthful preference of crucity over treachery. But alas! David's base expedient included both. Let us pause a moment, to mark the dreadful conscquences of persons in power being surrounded by instruments, apt and willing to second their evil purposes.

Had David, after the murder of Abner, courageously rid himself, in the strength of his God, of the powerful, but blood-thirsty "son of Zeruiah," Joab would not now have been at hand, to comprehend and execute, with all a villain's alacrity, the shameful commission given him by the king.

I do not know that throughout the whole course of this humiliating history—no, not even when Nathan says unto David, "Thou art the man," I ever feel so strongly the fathomless depth of his degradation, as when his base colleague in crime knows that he may triumphantly screen his own mismanagement of the siege, and consequent loss of life to God's people, by the bare mention of that piece of coveted intelligence,—"Thy servant Uriah, the Hittite, is dead also!"

"Thy servant!" oh, Mary! what a volume of undesigned reproach is there in that one word! The most tried and faithful of David's warriors—the sympathizing soldier, who, while his brethren of the army were exposed to hardships, denied himself the permitted comforts of his own house and home—the pious man, who (though an alien by birth from Israel) shrunk from ease and luxury, while the ark of God shared the perils of the distant camp—he it was, whom the same David, whose conscience smote him for cutting off even a fragment of the robe of Saul—coolly betrayed to the sword of the enemies of God and of Israel!

Never, my dear, while this transaction stands recorded, in all its deformity, on the page of Scripture, be tempted to distrust, as exaggerated, its representations of the depravity of man. But when you find that, by the purifying efficacy of grace the most unparalleled—sins, so "crimson" in their dye, could, in the sight of God, be at length "washed white" in the blood of the yet unborn "Seed" of their perpetrator—learn to wonder at and admire that "height and depth, and breadth and length, of the love of God in Christ," which, indeed, not only "passeth," but will ever transcend man's knowledge.

MARY. Mama! I hope since it says Bathsheba "mourned for her husband," that she knew nothing of his having been murdered.

MAMA. Let us charitably hope so, Mary, for the honour and sake of womanhood. Indeed we are warranted in so doing, not only by the absence of any joint censure of her, on that score, in Scripture (the removal of her child being evidently the chastisement of her previous participation in the guilt of which it was the offspring) but the unabated respect with which she was regarded through life by David; who, we are sure, could not so heartily have abhorred himself for "blood-guiltiness," and yet cherished an accomplice in the deed he loathed.

His first step, after the expiry of her allotted mourning. was to make her his wife, an act of reparation to which she was justly entitled, and by which it is to be presumed he lulled and quiet? I his, as yet, unawakened conscience; the stupe retion of which, under such atrocious guilt, is the best proof of the natural affinity of the unrenewed heart, for those "evil thoughts, murders, and adulteries," which our Lord himself tells us, find there a congenial residence.

But was the eye of Him, "who slumbereth not nor sleepeth," the less alive to the enormity of David's transgression?

MARY. No. It says, "the thing that David had done displeased the Lord;" but this seems little for so great a sin.

MAMA. Nothing, my dear Mary, but our habitual use of accumulated epithets, by which be simplicity of Scripture is sometimes made to appear comparatively tame—oould possibly lead you, or any one, to consider as a "little thing," the annunciation of the displeasure of the God of heaven and earth. Far less, I am sure, will you be disposed thus to regard it, when you find, that even when so far pardoned as to be favoured once more with the "light of God's reconciled countenance," the temporal effects of His "displeasure" ceased only with the life of the henceforward chastened and humiliated monarch of Israel.

That you may bear on your mind, for one day at least, in connexion with the sad history of David's lamentable fall, his awful sense of the far more terrible spiritual consequences of the wrath of an offended and alienated God—we will conclude our painful reading with the 38th Psalm; perhaps the most agonizing expression of woe, ever wrung by merited chastisement, from a sinful human being. Read me the affecting appeal to the justly forfeited mercy of God, contained in its four opening verses.

MARY. "O Lord, rebuke me not in thy wrath; neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure.

- " For thine arrows stick fast in me; and thy hand presseth me sore.
- "There is no soundness in my flesh, because of thine anger: neither is there any rest in n., bones, by reason of my sin.
- " For mine iniquities are gone over my head; as a heavy burden they are too heavy for me."

MAMA. Can any words more feelingly describe the intolerable anguish which a sense of unpardoned sin (heightened as some have thought, by severe bodily affliction, sent directly from God) was capable of inflicting? And, even supposing the latter conjecture to be well founded, how evidently does mental suffering preponderate over mere corporeal pants, when he says, "I have roared by reason of the disquietness of my heart!" And how cruelly does the "cup of trembling," mixed whim by the hand of God, seem to have been embittered by the estrangement of friends, and the reproaches of enemies; when the former stood aloof, regardless of his agonies, and the latter took advantage of his "foot slipping," (by which he means his late sad fall) to "magnify themselves against him!" And, above all, how grievous an aggravation is it of this heart-rending catalogue of miseries, that they should all have been the consequence of his own "foolishness;" a word, as we have often remarked, used indiscriminately for "wickedness" in Scripture!

But if the pressure of these united evils forced David, as he feelingly expresses it, to "be bowed, and go mourning all the day long," their ultimate effect seems to have been that for which they were graciously sent by Heaven, for he says, "I will declare mine iniquity, and be sorry for my sin; a pious frame of mind, in which (though somewhat anticipating the means by which it was brought about in our next chapter) it will be some consolation to us to leave one, in whom we have long taken so lively an interest.

MORNING SEVENTEENTIL

LESSON.-2d Samuel, Chapter xii. Psalm li.

MAMA. It was with difficulty, my dear Mary, that I yesterday resisted the temptation, to relieve the unmingled sadness of our painful reading, by the tender expedient devised by the compassion of God, for arousing the slumbering conscience of his erring servant. Not only, however, was it better for us, that we should retain on our minds the salutary weight left there, by even reading the records of unrepented sin,—but the touching parable itself, and its effect on the awakened sinner, would have been injured by being disjoined from their immediate and blessed result,—the penitential psalm, in which his guilt was at length amply bewailed, and abjured before God.

As for the parable, such is its exquisite fitness to go home at once to the feelings of young and old,—that it leaves little field for remark, not already anticipated by the matchless cloquence of Scripture.

MARY. Indeed, Mama, nothing even you could say, could explain or improve it. I remember crying over it, when I was a child, and thought it a true story; and was too young to understand what it meant.

MAMA. Nor will you, I am sure, feel it to be less touching now, when you can perceive its delicate bearing on the far more aggravated ease of David.

But did any sense of kindred guilt deter him from the usual readiness of man to arraign his erring fellow-creatures?

MARY. Not the least. His anger was so "greatly kindled," that he said the man who had taken his poor neighbour's lamb, should "surely die," and he called God to witness, too!

MAMA. Mary, were there not a word in the Bible, against judging, "that we be not judged," and about the "beam in our own eye," which we so gladly overlook, while alive to the slightest "mote in our brother's,"—these few words, "Thou art the man!" might for ever banish pride and censoriousness from an unabashed world! For a mere act of unneighbourly churlishness, the king of Israel was ready to sign the death warrant of another; when not even the "blood" of Uriah as yet "cried unto him from the ground," in reproach for a dishonoured family, and basely sacrificed friend!

But his awaking from such gross depths of self-delusion, must have been the more terrible. By what awful depundations, was its first shock followed up!

MARY. Their very mildness must have he coned their awfulness, Mama. God speaks more like as affected father, than an analy judge; and yet the sentence is as bad as possible. The "sword was never to depart from his house," and "evil was to rise up against him," out of his own family.

MAMA. And never was doom either more strictly appropriate, or more unerringly fulfilled; as all the sequel of this history will sadly con vince us.

What penalty might the rightful Lawgiver of heaven and earth, according to the king's own readily pronounced judgment, as well as the Divine decree, demanding "life for life"—have immediately exacted?

MARY. David's death, I suppose. But because he acknowledged his sin at once, God was pleased not only to spare his life, but to "put his sin away." How could this be, Mama, when it was punished by the loss of his child directly, and by all kinds of misfortunes for the rest of his days?

MAMA. I am glad you have asked this, Mary, because few discern sufficiently, the perfect compatibility of sins being "blotted out," by faith and repentance, from the accusing records of Heaven—and yet their temporal consequences continuing to harass through life, the repentant sinner's path. The goodness of the Almighty, in the seemingly prompt extension of the former kind of pardon to David, has been, even now, matter for much presumptuous arraigning of the justice of the Most High. What would it have been, had not temporal chastisements (in that age of visible Divine government especially) vindicated Jehovah's sense of the enormity of the two leading sins denounced in his own decalogue?

It has been elequently said of another much abused history, (that of the penitent thief on the cross) that "one such instance is recorded, that none might despair, and one only, that none might presume." The same, in some respects, may be said of the grace of God extended to David. Every encouragement to repentance, deep, humble, and immediate, is held out by it to the "chief of sinners." But, lest the festering "wounds," which even the sense of forgiveness could never entirely heat, in the "bruised spirit" of David, should not suffice to deter all from "going on to sin, because grace hath abounded," the predicted calamities of a whole remaining life, were expressly declared to be the requital before men, of that "sin," which (as regarded Himself) the Almighty, in the exercise of his unquestioned prerogative of mercy, had been pleased to "put away."

The grounds for this manifestation of what has been called, God's "darling attribute," in remitting the eternal punishment of the sin of David, will be better appreciated, (even by one so young, and little fitted to judge of the decree of Omnipotence) by turning now to the 51st Psalm; the faithful mirror to succeeding ages, of that thoroughly humbled and contrite frame of mind, which lay bare to the eye of Him who "seeth the heart," at the moment when David cried, "I have sinned against the Lord;" and justified, by its unequalled depth of self-abasement, the unparalleled answer of mercy, "The Lord hath put away thy sin."

To what well known, and often experienced leatures, in the character of his God, does the Psalmist betake himself, for the "blotting out" of his grievous transgressions?

MARY. His "kindness, and the multitude of His tender mercies." Well might he say this;—God had been so very, very good to him!

MAMA. And on this remembrance only does he found his humble hope of forgiveness. But Mary, is mere pardon, even at this early stage of the awakenings of a guilty conscience—the blessing uppermost in the mind of David?

MARY. No; he says, "wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin."

MAMA. Yes; both because sanctification is perceived by all true servants of God, to be an even nobler boon than pardon—and because, until purified by some agency higher than his own, he was not even fit to come as a suppliant, into the presence of Him who "cannot look upon iniquity."

Did he shew any disposition, like Adam, and most of his degenerate offspring, to extenuate, or get rid of the enormity of his crime?

MARY. Oh! no; he "acknowledged his transgression"—and said his "sin" was "ever before him."

MAMA. And why? What graved it, as with an iron pen, on his heart?

MARY. Because it was "committed against God, and God only"—and done "in his sight."

MAMA. Attend to this, my dear child, as an exemplification of the governing principle we have already attributed to the mind of David. His injurious conduct towards man—flagrant as it had been—is, as it were, swallowed up and annihilated, in the view of his sinfulness towards God. Would that more of this hallowing principle, pervaded the penitence (as it is styled) even of many Christians; who because they are smarting under the deplorable consequences of guilt, either to themselves, or others—dignify with the uange of repentance unto life, that "sorrow of the world" which we are told, by Him who "cannot lie"—"worketh" nothing but "death"—the spiritual death of error and delusion!

MARY. Mama—why does David ask to be cleansed with "hyssop?" What is it—and how could it make him "clean?"

Mama. A deep spiritual meaning, my dear, lies under the explanation of this little word—proving that from the "cedar of Lebanon to the hyssop on the wall" (as this herb is called from its frequent place of growth) nothing mentioned in the Bible is too insignificant to become matter for instruction. But the office of "hyssop" in the fitual of Moses, was no unimportant one. With a bunch of it—selected perhaps for fragrance—the "water of purification" was sprinkled on all persons, legally unclean, or more fatally defiled by the recent commission of sin. Water, however, though the appointed symbol of purity—could never alone have achieved the "cleansing" of one sinner. It was therefore significantly mixed with the ashes of the propitiatory sacrifice, by which alone (as a type, we know, of the future atonement of Christ) the stain of guilt could be removed, in the sight of God.

You will now understand why being "purged with hyssop"—(the instrument employed to convey even to unconscious Israelites, the benefit of a yet unborn Saviour's blood) was held by David as a sure means of becoming "clean." But you observe, he looks higher for the necessary office, than the mere temporal ministry of God's priests, however authorized. It is the Lord Himself, who must "sprinkle" and "wash" and "cleanse" him; and who alone can "bring a clean thing out of an unclean"—that work which has baffled, and in the emphatic words of Scripture, ever will baffle—the unassisted powers of man!

Indeed, so satisfied was David of the inefficacy of all human means to make him a new creature, that at once he intreats that Divine power might accomplish it, and breathes forth the prayef "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me."

None indeed, my dear, save He who created it at first, can stamp His renewed image on the soul, by which it has been wilfully defaced. And presumptuous indeed must that sinner be who reckons on an exertion short of Omnipotence, to repair the inroads of sin, or the wanton ravages of folly!

But what are the two means on which David—and not presumptuously—builds his hope of excluding from his regenerated heart, the evils he for ever abitines?

MARCH "I e "presence" and "Spirit" of God, I suppose you mean, mentioned in the next verse.

Mama. Yes, Mary—the only safeguards by which continuance in holiness, can for one moment, be insured. And if a sense of God's constant "presence" be the surest preservative against transgression—and the assistance of his "Spirit" the sole means by which its inroads can be resisted—well might one from whom both had been so recently, and fatally withdrawn, implore the restoration of the forfeited blessings!

But every verse of this most spiritual psalm might afford matter for a sermon, instead of a passing remark; and hoping its meaning and value will, with advancing age and experience, become daily more evident to yourself, I will only touch on those remarkable remaining verses, expressive of the Psalmist's deep conviction of the godly sorrow for past sin, most acceptable to God, and the bounden duty of every pardoned transgressor.

What startling remark does he make concerning "sacrifice"—at apparent variance with the known ordinance of God, and his own subsequent declaration that with such He will be "well pleased?"

MARY. He says God does not "desire sacrifice," or "delight in burnt offerings;" this sounds strange.

MAMA. Yes Mary; from our not adverting to the Hebrew idiom, by which any thing inferior to another, is often as it were annihilated, and a negative substituted for a comparative term. What "sacrifice" do we gather from the next verse, "is preferred by God," even to the institutions of His appointment?

MARY. A "broken spirit," Mama, a "broken and contrite heart,"—these it is said, He "will not despise."

MAMA. No, Mary; and words more consolatory (resounding especially as they do, from the depths of a convinced sinner's heart) are not to be found in the treasury of Scripture! But while aware, even under the Jewish economy, of the inefficacy of the "blood of bulls and of goats," to "take away sin"—did David look forward to no period when "whole burnt offerings" of pious gratitude might find acceptance with him who had ordained them?

MARY. Oh yes; but 1 don't know exactly what he means by "then," at the beginning of the last verse.

Mama. It means when God should sanction, with his renewed blessing, that "building of the walls of Jerusalem," in which David had been piously engaged; till diverted from it by sinful pursuit or deterred by secret unworthiness.

MANY. Oh, now I understand; this makes it quite plain.

MAMA. And I wish it may make as clear to you, the different, and superior nature, and value in the sight of God. of that spontaneous tribute of obedience, emanating from the gratitude of the redeemed and purchased Christian—over the same "sacrifice," proceeding from the slavish, and unfilial, and unscriptural principle of earning with it a salvation, which all the united obedience of mankind, could never purchase for a single individual; and which bears to the "free will offering" of a heart, grateful for accomplished redemption—as poor and distant a resemblance, as the types and shadows of Judaism to that Sun of Righteousness who has eclipsed them by the "brightness of his rising."

But we must go back once more, to notice the employment, to which David proposes, in gratitude for forgiveness, to dedicate his future life; and of which this Psalm affords an inestimable specimen. What is said of it at verse 13th?

MARY. "Then will I teach transgressors thy way, and sinners shall be converted to thee."

MAMA. And such, let us hope, will be its effect on us, and on the many thousands to whom David has been made (like Noah) a "preacher of rightcoursess," by the events of his life, and the commentary on them, contained in his Psalms.

Having now, my dear, reviewed the grounds which, even to our finite apprehension, justify the removal from David of the everlasting doom due to his sins—we must return to survey, with equal submission to the will of Him who never "afflicts willingly," "nor grieves" needlessly "the children of men"—the train of family afflictions by which his breach of the most sacred ties, was appropriately punished. What was the first of these?

MARY. The child which Bathsheba had born, was to die. Mama, nobody, not even David himself, could think this unjust.

MAMA. No, Mary; but many overlook the reason assigned for its judicial removal, because by the "deed" which gave it birth, David "had given occasion to the enemies of God to blaspheme;" a consequence, alas! not confined to the scoffers of his days, though even then, (as he complains in the 69th psalm,) the "reproaches" of them that through him "reproached God" formed an aggravated feature in his distress.

Was there any thing singular in the deportment of the king, under this trial, and bereavement?

MARY. He prayed fervently to God while the child lived, in hopes it might yet be spared, but when all was over, became composed and reconciled directly. So do many good people now, Mama, I think.

MAMA. True, Mary; and on the same consoling grounds—never perhaps more beautifully expressed than here—of expected reunion in another and better world. But the peculiarity of David's conduct which so much surprised his servants, consisted in his anticipating by his own commands, the friendly offices usually performed for Jewish mourners, by others. What did we lately learn on this subject?

MARY. That it was customary for visitors to a house of mourning, to bring provisions, and constrain the afflicted to take food.

MAMA. And, as it was customary for the survivors to bemoan their loss, by sitting on the ground for several days, (like Job) the "rising from the earth" of David, was another departure from established usage; and shewed that he feared, by the indulgence of even permitted sorrow, to seem to murmur at the just decree of God.

In acceptance probably of this pious submission, God sent him in due time, another son, whose name of "Solomon,"—signifying "peaceful," indicated his father's faith in the predicted peace and prosperity of his future reign.

But to this God was pleased, by the ministry of the prophet Nathan, (to whose charge the child was from infancy consigned) to add a title more consolatory still; that of "Jedidiah," which means "beloved of the Lord."

Oh! Mary, what a striking proof is it that God "seeth not as man seeth," that of all the numerous family of David, none should have either received or deserved so blessed an appellation, save the child of his penitence and contrition; sent, as it were, by a pitying God, to comfort the most wretched of fathers, under the approaching troubles and crimes of his household!

But before entering on these, (from a detailed review of which I shall endeavour to spare you and myself) we must glance at, and set right, on eminent authorities, a too common misconception on the subject of the supposed barbarities committed by David on the conquered Ammonites. MARY. I am glad you can explain this; as I was sorry David should be so cruel, and thought it was not at all like him.

MAMA. No. Mary; even while admitting that the Ammonites were themselves noted for barbarity—that in those less civilized times acts of retaliation were not only common but universal-and that the insult David had lately received in the person of his ambassadors might have called for signal retribution-we must feel relieved by the idea now generally adopted, that it was only by condemning his prisoners to painful and toilsome labours (resemblifig in kind those of the Israclites in Egypt, and connected probably with the vast preparations he had even then begun to make for the sacred temple) that David That he exercised his privilege as a conqueror. did not act towards them with any unusual or indefensible severity, is best proved by the decisive circumstance, that shortly after-in his own distressful flight before Absalom-he was met by the brother of the very king Hanun, whose injurious conduct he had only properly resentedwith ample supplies of cattle and provisions for himself and people; and every token, not of forced submission, but of real sympathy and neighbourly good will.

Had this been always properly brought forward, instead of being disingenuously suppressed—a world of "reproach" against David, and through him against the God he served, would have fallen to the ground. Let us bless Him, my dear, that if scoffers and blasphemers have never ceased to exert their pernicious subtilty in perverting Scripture—neither hath He at any time left Himself without a witness, in the many faithful men by whom their errors have been ably exposed.

MORNING EIGHTEENTH.

LESSON. -2: Samuel, Chapter xv. Psalms iii. and xlii.

MAM. It seldom, my dear Mary, that I approve of substituting human abridgements for the admirable, and generally useful, minuteness of Scripture. But we have lately emerged, under its guidance, from one dismal labyrinth of guilt and bloodshed; and fearful alike of weakening, by familiarity with crime, the natural horror of a youthful mind—or of associating painful impressions with the delightful study of the Bible—I have resolved to spare you and myself the detailed recital of the shocking treasons and murders, by which "evil" was indeed made to "rise up against David out of his own house."

The unfortunate separation of what ought to have formed one united "household," into distinct families—educated, according to the custom of those times, under the roof of their several mothers—gave rise to a possibility, (happily unknown among us) of prohibited attachments, among those who were brothers and sisters only in name, and not in affectionate daily intercourse from childhood. From the guilty admiration of Amnon, the eldest son of David, for one, who (as if to mark the sort of estrangement of feeling I have noticed) is called "the sister of his brother Absalom,"—sprung a whole train of deadly evils; and a punishment, of which none could fail to see the appropriateness—for the invasion by David, of the family peace and honour of Uriah.

The result—not immediate, but brooded on with unbrotherly rancour, for "two full years,"—was the treacherous murder, under the guise of fraternal hospitality, of Amnon, by his incensed younger brother Absalom; while to the king, the shock was embittered, first, by his having been led to apprehend the involvement in the slaughter of his whole family—by the consent which had been wrung from him, for Amnon to be present on the occasion—and by that secret partiality for Absalom, which made the banishment which justice obliged him to enforce, peculiarly painful to a parent's heart.

Of this, advantage was skilfully taken by Joeb; ever ready officiously to interpose, for weal or woe, in the affairs of his uncle. And by an ingenious fiction, the drift of which accorded but too well with his own private inclination—David was unhappily persuaded to recall his favourite son; after a three years' refuge with his maternal grandfather, a petty neighbouring king, at whose court he seems, alas! to have learned any lessons save those of penitence, filial piety, or loyalty!

For when David—as a proper but hard sacrifice to outraged parental and regal dignity—forbore for two years from admitting him (though in Jerusalem) to his presence—the turbulence of Absalon disposition broke out in the method employed by him for compelling the interference of Joab in his behalf, viz. setting on fire the cornin his adjacent fields.

This, and his unblushing demand to see the king, and insolent challenge "if there be any iniquity in mc, let him kill me"—sufficiently prepare us for the career of treason and rebellion, by which he fulfilled towards his unhappy parent, the office of God's avenger; and then, like a broken vessel"—an instrument justly despised—was cast aside, unlamented by any, except his outraged but still partial father.

MARY. Thank you, Mama, for telling me all titis so plainly and shortly. I am sure it could not be pleasant to read about it.

MAMA. That, Mary, had, I believed it profitable, would have been a very insufficient reason for declining to dwell on it. But all that is necessary for us to know of this tissue of crimes and miseries, is their correspondence with the past denunciations of God, and their connexion with the future history of David; and these, the sketch I have given will enable you to trace.

MARY. Mama! was not Absalom remarkably handsome; and famous for his wonderful head of hair?

MAMA. Turn back and see—to gratify your youthful curiosity on this point—what is said of him at verse 25th of the chapter preceding that we have just read.

MARY. "In all Israel, there was none to be so much praised as Absalom, for his beauty; from the sole of his foot, even to the crown of his head, there was no blemish in him."

MAMA. I was anxious you should read this precise description of a bodily perfection, rendered utterly valueless, by the want of corresponding qualities of heart and mind. Indeed, the "beauty" of Absalom, like the length of his boasted hair, may probably be reckoned one of his greatest misfortunes; as on it alone could have been founded the injurious parental partiality, and popular favour, by which he was emboldened to acts of the grossest filial impiety.

How do we find him paving the way for these, in the beginning of our chapter?

MARY. " Absalom prepared chariots and horses, and fifty men to run before him."

MAMA. So far, he might only be affecting a little more state than belonged to the now eldest son of a powerful monarch. But by what pretended attention to their interests, did he insidiously set himself to "steal the hearts" of his father's subjects?

MARY. He stood "beside the gate" (that was where kings sat to try causes, Mama, was it not!) and said, "oh! that I were made judge in the land, that every man who had a suit or cause, might come to me, and I would do him justice!"

Mama. What a cruel and unjust reflection, did these insinuations convey, on a king, of whom the "wise woman" employed by Joab to lay a fictitious case for decision before him, had lately said, "as an angel of God, so is my lord the king, to discern good and bad;" and who we are sure, from his very eagerness (however misplaced) to avenge the slaughter of the "ewe-lamb," was never backward to do justice to the meanest of his people! But of this, and all his other benefits, they soon shewed themselves basely forgetful. Nor could a nation, so prone to "forget God" as the Israelites were, be expected to "cleave" with unswerving loyalty to a mere earthly sovereign.

Of what sacrilegious pretence did Absalom avail himself, to get his father's consent to leave Jerusalem?

MARY. A shocking one, Mama! he pretended to have a vow to pay to God for bringing him safe home again. But it says this was after "forty years;" and surely if that was the case, Absalom could not be young when he died, as I always fancied.

MAMA. The precise term of "forty years" here mentioned, has been attended with so much difficulty, from its exceeding by many years not only the age of Absalom, but even the then duration of the reign of David, (to which some have supposed it to refer) that it seems much more natural to adopt the idea of those who think "forty" is merely a transcriber's error for "four," the number of years really elapsed since Absalom's return from Geshur; two of which, you know, had passed before his reconciliation with his now ill-requited parent.

How did he shamefully abuse the too easily granted permission—to "go in peace."

MARY. By sending men with trumpets through all Israel to proclaim himself king; and it says, "the hearts of the men of Israel were after Absalom." How could the ungrateful creatures prefer a foolish lad to David?

MAMA. Just as their ancestors had preferred the sway of Saul, a yet untried youth, to the righteous dominion over them of the King of kings! But you forget that the God, in whose hands are the "hearts" of men, had permitted the saccess of this unnatural conspiracy, in furtherance of his designs of chastisement on David, "against" whom (as we before remarked) "evil was to rise up out of his own house."

But from what moving incident do we best gather the alarming progress, and irresistible character of this rebellion?

MARY. Oh! Mama, David was obliged to flee for his life, from Jerusalem. Surely such a great warrior could have staid and defended it, if he had chosen. It would have been more like him.

MAMA. Like him, perhaps, in his days of former bravery, when, to the fearlessness of youth, was added the indomitable firmness, inspired by the protection of the Most High. But the now penitent and broken-spirited David, knew too well that the present affliction was from Him—to entertain even a thought of defence or resist-que. And it is this evident sense of religious humiliation, and submission, which lend to a flight,—that we might otherwise think pusillanimous—so deep and overwhelming an interest.

This will be greatly enhanced, if we turn to the 3d Psalm, penned amid the hurry and dejection, inseparable from his situation—yet preserving throughout, such a pious reliance on the ultimate fulfilment of God's promises of mercy. Read me the opening verses of this fugitive monarch's affecting appeal.

MARY. "Lord, how are they increased that trouble me? many are they that rise up against me; many there be which say of my soul, 'There is no help for him in God.'"

Mama. Yes, Mary; in this lay as usual, the chief bitterness of his affliction—that men, through his misconduct, and consequent adversities, should be led to question the "truth and faithfulness" of the Lord. But liow confidently does he—even from the depth of temporal abasement—still look up to the often experienced protection of his God?

MARY. He says, he "will not be afraid of ten thousands of people, who have set themselves against him, round about;" and calls on God to "save him," because "salvation belongeth unto the Lord."

MAMA. With this pious reflection, let us console ourselves, while following the steps of the fallen king of Israel, and his handful of faithful servants, along that melancholy pilgrimage, from, instead of towards "God's holy hill,"—so painfally contrasted with the triumphant journey "Zionward," which we lately commomorated.

MARY. Mama! who were the "Cherethites, and Pelethites, and Gittites," that staid with David? They must have been good people.

MAMA. Their desertion would indeed have been infamous; for the two first mentioned, composed the king's own body guard; and the "Gittites" are supposed either to be Philistine proselytes, com "Ittai"—their head, being called a stranger) or more likely, Israelites, who, by resorting to David during his exile at Gath, had become in some measure, aliens.

But be this as it may, what was the result of the generous strife, between the distressed monarch, and "Ittai," the determined sharer of his evil, as well as prosperous fortunes?

MARY. His answer is almost as beautiful as Ruth's. "As the Lord liveth, and as my lord the king liveth, surely in what place my lord the king shall be, whether in death or life, there will thy servant be." Mama, one could almost find in one's heart to weep, like "all the country," to see so great a king, afraid of his own wicked son, and obliged to flee, as he did in Saul's time, "into the wilderness."

MAMA. Yes; and without either the buoyancy of spirit, or immediate countenance of God, which then lightened every hardship, and made perils disappear.

But how did he prove—amid the strongest temptation to act otherwise—his prevailing regard for the honour, and acquiescence in the dispensations of the Most High?

MARY. He would not let the priests bring the ark of God away with him, (though it would have been such a comfort!) but sent it back again; and says so sweetly, "If I shall find favour in the cycs of the Lord, he will bring me again, and shew me both it and his habitation. But if he say, 'I have no delight in thee,' behold here am I, let him do to me as seemeth good unto him." This was the true way, Mama, to make God pity, and restore him.

MAMA. That He did both, we shall ere long have proof. And that in parting with the symbol of God's presence, David made a truly heroic sacrifice, we shall best gather from his passionate aspirations after spiritual privileges, contained in the 42d Psalm, composed on this affecting occasion.

With this we shall close our present reading'; first noticing the external circumstances of humiliation, under which it was wrung from the Psalmist's desolate heart. What deep, and (except in one awful instance) unparalleled symbols of distress, marked the progress of the king of Israel, along the "Mount of Olives?"

MARY. "He wept as he went up, and had his head covered, and went barefoot; and all the people with him, went up, weeping as they went."

MAMA. To go with the head covered, and the feet bare, indicated in those days, excess of grief and humiliation; and for a mighty monarch to be the publicly seen, bore a testimony, as affecting as unequivocal, of outward resignation to the Divine will.

But of the inward emotions of his soul, we have a yet more uncring index, in the psalm already mentioned. Under what sylvan imagery, suggested probably by the wild and parched nature of the country they were entering on—does David represent his longing for the sacred rites he had been so cruelly forced to abandon?

MARY. "As the hart panteth after the waterbrooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God. My soul thirsteth for God, even the living God; when shall I come and appear before God?"

MAMA. And with what painful fidelity and minuteness does he recall to his agonized memory, the forfeited pleasures of the sanctuary?

MARY. "When I remember these things, I pour out my soul in me; for I had gone with the multitude. I went with them to the house of God, with the voice of joy and praise; with a multitude that kept holy day."

Mama. Would, Mary, that all estrangement from the house and service of God, were as involuntary, and as deeply deplored as David's! Then, indeed, might the Christian, while pining under suspended privileges—echo, either from the pathless desert, or yet more trackless deep, or from the solitude of some chamber of paralyzing sickness,—the Psalmist's triumphant enquiry, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise Him, who is the light of my countenance, and my God."

MORNING NINETEENTH.

LESSON.-24 Samuel, Chapters xvi. and xvii. Psalm lv.

MA: We are to-day, my dear Mary, to have our feelings of sympathy for the fugitive king of Israel, farther called forth, by the aggravation his distress received from the treachery of friends, and the reviling of enemies. Let us but follow his instructive example, in regarding these (however grievous) as wholesome parts of the discipline exercised over him by a just though merciful God,—and edification will be taught to flow from incidents in themselves the most painful and revolting.

For the first of these, we must turn back to the concluding verses of our last chapter. What piece of intelligence, equally bitter and unexpected, did David receive concerning Ahithophel?

'MARY. That he was among the conspirators with Absalom. But why should this have been so unexpected?

MAMA. Because he was the king's chief, and most trusted adviser, or (as in the bitterness of his heart he elsewhere expresses it) his "own familiar friend," who thus "took counsel" against him. What does he, on the first shock of the information, pray may be the result of the perfidious counsel?

MARY. That God would "turn it to foolishness."

MAMA. Yes; that He who had often to rescue His servants, "confounded the wisdom of the wise," would interpose in David's behalf, (as we shall find He did) by rendering useless the experience and sagacity of Ahithophel. But are you aware of the secret reason which urged a man, grown grey in the service and favour of the father, to espouse the cause of his rebellious son?

MARY. No. It seems very strange and unnatural.

MAMA. Not in the least, when you know that he was the grandfuther of Bathsheba; whose marriage with David, had, we see, failed to obliterate from the mind of so near a relative, the injury inflicted on her, and the murder of her first husband; ever since which, his apparent friendship for David had probably been only assumed. To this deceit and dissimulation, direct allusion is made in the psalm we have included in our present reading, where David says, "The words of his mouth were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart; his words were softer than oil, yet were they drawn swords."

But before proceeding to the touching latter portions of this 55th Psalm—how strikingly do its earlier verses pourtray the tumult and confusion attendant on the sudden revolt, and the flight it rendered necessary—and the depth of the panic from the Lord, which had seized even David?

M rec. "My heart is sore pained within me, and the terrors of death are fallen upon me. Fearfulness and trembling are come upon me, and horror hath overwhelmed me."

MAMA. And what touching aspiration does be breathe forth, for escape from "the strife and violence he had seen in the city?"

MARY. "Oh! that I had wings like a dove; for then would I fly away and be at rest." Mama! I always thought that wish of David's beautiful, but never knew exactly what made him utter it. How I shall like to read the Psalms now, when every word of them will put me in mind of some part of this interesting story!

MAMA. Yes, Mary; you will henceforth read them, I hope, not only with the relish of one acquainted with their occasion and import—but with the thankfulness of a Christian, for their encouragement to faith, and example of submission, under the heaviest trials to which humanity can be subjected. But what appears, from the rest of this affecting hymn, to have been the sharpest thorn in the present afflictive dispensation?

MARY. Oh! Ahithophel's treachery. Had it been an "enemy," David says, he could have "borne it:" but it was a man his "equal," his "guide," his "acquaintance," with whom he "took sweet counsel, and walked to the house of God in company."

MAMA. Yes; one descending, like himself, into the vale of years—yet so far advanced before him on the downward pilgrimage, as to have been his honoured "guide" in the difficult science of government; but above all, the depositary of his most secret thoughts, and his fellow-worshipper at the footstool of their common Lord,—IIe it was who now cruelly (though it must be owned, not wholly unprovoked) availed himself of the first opportunity to turn against him with all the bitterness of long-cherished hatred!

MARY. Mama, this is very true, and I am not surprised David was angry, as well as hurt. But I am sorry he should wish even such a deceitful friend to "go down quick into hell."

MAMA. I am very glad you have observed it; because many pious persons, as well as yourself, are shocked at this, and similar imprecations in the Book of Psalms; where, in most cases, they might have been more truly rendered, as simple prophetic intimations of the fate reserved by God, for such as like Ahithophel, betray, and revolt against their lawful rulers.

In this instance, it was certainly rather a prediction of the self-murder of a traitor, (who, in his fate as well as his conduct, resembled Judas,) than a prayer for a catastrophe, quite foreign to the singularly placable disposition of David; a temper which should lead us to interpret in the same manner, all seemingly vindictive expressions put into his mouth by our translation of passages susceptible of a different and milder meaning.

To confirm this decidedly in the case before us, we have only to look forward to the end of the Psalm, where the sentiment objected to is expressed (in a manner less liable to misrepresentation,) by a simple reference to the known decree of God.

"But thou, O God, shalt bring them down into the pit of destruction; bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days; but I will trust in thee."

MARY. I understand this quite now, Mama, and shall never think David prays for harm on any one, again.

MAMA. We must now return to our history. On whose tried fidelity and prudence did David rely, for defeating (under God) the counsel of Ahithophel?

MARY. "Hushai the Archite," who wanted to go with him; but David would not let him, thinking he might be of more use in the city. But, Mama, would he not be as bad as Ahithophel, if he pretended to be Absalom's servant, and all the time was David's.

MAMA. I am never sorry, my dear, when the repugnance to all falsehood, natural to unsophisticated minds, prompts you to remark on apparent violations of integrity,-even when recorded of the most distinguished characters in Scripture. For, in the first place, (as we have often remarked) the faulty portions of their history are as much written for our instruction, as the most praiseworthy; though (as is the case, I think, here) they sometimes admit of a more favourable construction than is at first put on them. not so much for adhering to, and promoting (even by questionable means) the cause of his rightful sovereign, that Hushai is deservedly censured-as for expressly "doing evil that good might come," by seeming to countenance, for a moment, the rebellion he in his heart abhorred.

In so doing, he has unhappily (like his master) "given occasion for the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme,"—as if the God of all truth, in permitting his deceit to become subservient to the punishment of far blacker treachery—sanctioned all the actions of his fallible instruments. David's share in the transaction indicated want of his habitual trust in God; who needed not the aid of human prudence, far less of human perjury, to "turn the counsel of Ahithophel into foolishness."

Bu by what false representation was David, just .. a, very appropriately himself deceived?

MAMA. "Ziba," Mephibosheth's rich steward, came out to meet him with a present of provisions, and said, his "master's son" staid behind, in hopes of being made king himself. Was this a lie?

MAMA. It has been generally so considered; and David's rashness, in at once depriving an absent person (the son, too, of his friend Jonathan) of all he had bestowed upon him, on the mere interested report of a servant, must have been matter to him, of subsequent regret and remorse.

But, to what open outrage and insult—amounting to personal violence—was the king exposed, at the hands of a really ungrateful survivor of, the family of Saul?

MARY. Shimei not only came out, and "cursed". the king, and called him a "bloody man," and a "man of Belial," but cast stones at him and his servants.

MAMA. And on what did he ground this virulence of spite and hatred? Was it well founded?

MARY. No; for he said, God had "returned on David, all the blood of the house of Saul,"—and he never killed one of them.

MAMA. Turn to the 7th Psalm, verse 3d, and see the affecting appeal of David to Him who "knoweth all things," on this malicious slander.

MARY. "O Lord, my God, if I have done this—if there be iniquity in my hands:

"If I have rewarded evil unto him that was at peace with me, (yea, I have delivered him that without cause, was mine enemy.")

That he had, Mama! spared Saul's life twice over, when he might have taken it.

MAMA. Yes, Mary; but that effort of magnanimity, greatly as it has been praised and admired—sinks in comparison with the conquest over justly insulted feelings, which taught David, even in his present harassed and exasperated frame of mind, to spare the venomous reptile whom he could have crushed in a moment, in his path. But this he utterly declines; and that on a principle more sublime, and honourable to his piety, than even his prevailing one, of committing his defence (as he says in the Psalm) to God, who "seeth the upright in heart."

Though free from the precise kind of "blood-guiltiness" ascribed to him by the violent "son of Gera"—his conscience told him of "blood," for which the curses of Shimei were a just and appointed retribution. And Oh! Mary, let us, prone as we all are indignantly to resist even merited reproach—recall the meckness and submission, under Divine rebuke, of David, and his memorable answer,—"The Lord hath said unto him, 'Curse David who Jall say, wherefore has thou done it?"

MARY. This was really beautiful of him.

MAMA. The excuse he made, too, for the wretch, that he might well act so, when his own "very son sought his life"—how much does it prove the depth of the absorbing grief that swallowed up every other in the father's mind! But did these affecting words or this generous forbearance, disarm Shimei?

MARY. Not a bit, Mama; he went on cursing, and throwing stones still.

MAMA. And not only "stones," but "dust," which, throughout the East, is done to this day, by those who accuse a criminal, and demand justice against him. Bear this in mind, when you come to read his abject submission, and David's noble acceptance of it.

What, in the mean time, was taking place at Jerusalem?

MARY. Hushai, "David's friend," was pretending to join Absalom; and though it served him right perhaps, for his deceit—it is shocking to hear Absalom taunting him, with having left his father.

Mama. And had the intoxication of success not infatuated the miserable rebel, he might have read, in the cautious evasive answer of Hushai—the unchanged nature of that allegiance, which you observe he only says he will yield to him, whom "the Lord" as well as the people, should "choose."

But how mercifully was it ordered for David, that while the demoniac suggestions of Ahithophel's revenge (by which the denunciations of Nathan were fearfully accomplished) were listened to as if in truth the "oracle of God"—his really politic advice, by which the ruin of David was rendered, humanly speaking—inevitable—was treated with a contempt, which broke his own proud heart, and caused the destruction of Absalom!

What was the plan his long experience suggested?

MARY. To take "twelve thousand ment' that night, and come upon David while he was "weary and weak-handed"—and Oh! Mama—well do I see that revenge was at the bottom of it—for the monster wished to be the man to do it—and "kill the king only." But a more shocking thing still—the "saying pleased Absalom!" I used to think he could not mean to murder his father, but only to force David to make him his heir—but I shall never be in the least sorry for him more.

MAMA. I hope not—nor could a thought of pity ever have attended one, who was in heart, a parricide—but for the pathetic lamentation, extort. I by nature from the parent whose death he desired.

But how was this unnatural "desire" frustrated?

MARY. By his listening to the advice of Hushai. The first part of it, about David and his people being desperate—and fighting "like a bear robbed of her whelps"—seemed likely enough; though if they had known he was so meek and subdued, they would not have been afraid of him. But surely, Mama, all Israel pulling any city he might be in, "with ropes into a river"—sounded like madness, and might have made them see Hushai was making fools of them.

MAMA. By no means, Mary; had your experience of ancient sieges (and I think you have read of a great number in Josephus) made you familiar with the engines used, before the invention of cannon, for demolishing the walls of fortified places; one of the commonest of which, consisted of huge hooks thrown by ropes over the battlements; which frequently came toppling down with them, from the great force in pulling exerted by the besiegers.

But, though this, and the prospect it afforded of involving in one common ruin, David and his followers, removes all absurdity from the expedient of Hushai-it was too manifestly inferior in energy and wisdom, to that proposed by Ahithophel, to have been adopted, even by a rash youth, (far less by his experienced advisers)-unless the "eyes of their understanding" had been judicially "blinded" by God. We now see the temporal advantage of the self-denial exercised by David, in sending back the priests along with the ark-as his devoted friends, Zadok and Abiathar, were enabled to despatch their respective sons to give him notice of the happy respite afforded him by the suggestion of Hushai; and great must have been his thankfulness for the rescue achieved for him, by the interposition of the Lord. To this we find allusions in various Psalms, from the 41st to the 43d, all composed at this time, and admirably expressive of the alternations of trouble and deliverance, by which his instructive pilgrimage was chequered.

What traces of reviving hope and confidence do we find at verse 11th of the first of these psalms—decidedly identified with the present relief, by the previous mention in it of the traitor Ahithophel, as his "own familiar friend?"

MARY. "By this I know that thou favourest me, because mine enemy doth not triumph over me."

MAMA. And see how distinctly, in the latter, he looks forward to a return, under Divine guidance - God's "holy hill" and tabernacle; and his joyful anticipation of resuming his most hallowed and favourite occupations! What were these, Mary?

MARY. "Then will I go unto the altar of God; unto God my exceeding joy: yea, upon the harp will I praise Thee; O God, my God."

MAMA. And delightful it is to mark these beams of "light and truth," "sent out" (according to his fervent petition) from above; to reanimate the drooping soul, and "revive the spirit of the contrite one!"

We must now turn to a less pleasing subject, the self-destruction of the baffled traitor—to which, foreseeing the inevitable ruin of the usurper's cause—he was goaded by conscience, thus anticipating the stroke of justice; though the obloquy which has cleaved to his memory and fate, and its involuntary association with that of a blacker traitor still—far exceeds any ignominy which could have been inflicted by the hand of the executioner.

But amid so much of sickening domestic treachery, it is delightful to witness the concurrence of strangers—from various motives of gratitude and generosity—in acts of substantial kindness to David, and his suffering followers. Who was the first of these, and what were the reasons of his liberality?

MARY. "Shobi," king of the Ammonites; you know he was brother to Hanun whose "crown of gold" David "lifted off," for ill-using his ambassadors.

MAMA. And which he must have generously replaced, contrary to the custom of those days, on the head of the next in succession; who now gratefully requited this act of royal elemency.

What do we know about the second of these "friends in need?"

MARY. Was he not the person who brought up Mephibosheth?

MAMA. The same; and well had David succeeded in converting foes into friends, when Sau's most faithful adherent was thus foremost to testify his loyalty and affection to the Lord's anointed! As for Barzillai—the third mentioned—all we know of him is, that his generosity equalled his great wealth; and that, in the person of his son, it was David's happiness to be able to repay it.

What was the nature of the relief brought by these considerate purveyors?

MARY. "Beds" (these must have been a great comfort!) "and basons," as well as food to put in them,—"butter, and honey, and choese, and the pp, and kine." No wonder David was grateful to them!

MAMA. No, Mary; but his chief tribute ascended, as it ever did, to Him, whose are not only "the cattle on a thousand hills," but in whose "hand are the hearts of the children of men," to dispose them to "do good and communicate;" and who (as it is beautifully expressed in the 23d psalm) had now, even when figuratively walking as it were, through the "valley and shadow of death, prepared him a table in the presence of his enemies, and made his cup to run over."

And observe the cheering and pious inferences drawn by him from the temporal bounties of God: "Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all my life; and I will dwell in the house of the Lord, for ever."

MORNING TWENTIETH.

LESSON-2d Samuel, Chapter xviii. xix. and xx.

MAMA. Though our reading to-day has enabled us to accompany David, in a career of restored success and victory, contrasting forcibly with the humiliation of his previous flight—yet quite enough of grief and alloy has mingled with every step of his homeward pilgrimage, to suppress, in our minds, as well as his—all feelings of pride or exultation. What portion indeed of such sentiments, could find place in the bosom of a tender father, compelled by duty to his people, and respect for the crown he held from God, to put down as an impious rebel, his own favourite and long beloved son?

How may we trace the lingerings of parental partiality, in the directions given by him (in certain anticipation, through his God, of success) to the three commanders of his army; after his first proposal of leading it in person, had been, no doubt to his secret relief, over-ruled by the reviving regard of his subjects?

MARY. He says, "Deal gently, for my sake, with the young man, even with Absalom;" and every body "heard him," so that Joab could not pretend ignorance. I am not surprised, Mama, that such wicked rebels should be defeated; but what does it mean, that the "wood devoured more people that day than the sword!"

MAMA. We might have been at a loss to explain this, had not Josephus (himself a skilful which in joint told us, that the battle was fought in an open plain, with a "wood" adjoining to it,—entanglement in the mazes of which, impeded instead of securing the escape of those who took shelter in it.

But what was the peculiar, indeed unparalleled fate of Absalom?

MARY. He was caught up in a tree, by the very thick hair he was so proud of; and his mule went on, and he was left hanging.

MAMA. And in this strange catastrophe might be seen an emblem of his whole enterprize, and its disastrous termination. For had he been content to remain in the enviable, and no doubt, envied situation, of elder and favourite son to the king, without aspiring prematurely and impiously to the throne—his life might have been honourable, and his end peaceful; just as, had no boasted exuberance of locks adorned his head—he might have escaped alive, according to his father's merciful injunctions.

How were these insolently, though perhaps wisely, violated by Joah?

MARY. He was very angry with a man who had seen Absalom langing, and had not killed him. But the man was quite right, for "all the people" had heard David forbid it.

MAMA. Yes; and to what certain danger, would he by so doing, have exposed himself,—or, as he expresses it, have "wrought falsehood against his own life?"

MARY. Oh! I know what he means. If David had slain directly the Amalekite, who boasted of killing Saul—and the two captains, for murdering Ishbosheth—no wonder the man felt sure he would not fail to punish, whoever should venture to take Absalom's life.

MAMA. A just inference. But did it deter Joah from taking on himself the executioner's office?

MARY. No; he was far too fond of killing every body; and so fierce and haughty, that he was not afraid even of David.

MAMA. As is usual in all human actions, he was stimulated to the deed by a complication of motives, more or less commendable; amid which, his natural ferocity, and revenge for Absalom's former ill-usage, probably predominated. But we may believe he was not altogether uninfluenced by the regard, which—in his own overbearing style—he yet felt for the security and interest of Devid's kingdom.

Having, therefore, by savagely thrusting the defenc less wretch through with three darts—sanctioned his pitiless slaughter by the hands of his princur-bearers—he now, in the humane spirit of a king's instructions—recalled the pursuers, and put an end to civil bloodshed. But did he reserve to his master the poor consolation of burying his son in his own sepulchre?

MARY. No; they east him into a great pit in the wood, and laid a heap of stones above him. Was this for fear David should wish to remove the body?

MAMA. Partly, perhaps; but more likely, to fulfil, even after the transgressor was dead—the Mosaic duty of "stoning" a rebellious and disobedient son. Was such a "dog's death," as it is somewhere called in scripture—contemplated by Absalom in the days of his pomp and prosecrity?

MARY. Oh! no; for he had reared to himself a fine pillar, to keep his name in remembrance; and beside it, I suppose, he meant to be buried. There is no fear of his being forgotten,—his wickedness makes him remembered; but what became of the pillar?

MAMA. It was standing, two centuries ago, in the time of one of our earlier travellers; though half buried, in consequence of even the Turkish masters of Judea, throwing a stone at it as they passed, in abhorrence of filial impiety.

But what affecting particular have we, of the inexplicable yearnings of a parent's heart, towards one so utterly undeserving?

MARY. David was sitting—looking out anxiously for news—"between the two gates"—what does that mean?

MAMA. In the ample space or porch, afforded by the thickness of the walls of ancient cities—between their outer and inner gates. By whom were the dreaded tidings brought?

MARY. After all, by "Ahimaaz the son of Zadok the priest." But why would Joab not let him "run" at first?

MAMA. From a reluctance, (which shews us there is in the rudest bosoms, some touch of feeling) that a lad he liked, should perhaps lose the king's favour, as the bearer of unwelcome tidings. How do we gather that what was intended to save David's feelings—enhanced his disappointment?

MARY. Because, when he saw Ahimaaz fore-ne st, and running so fast, he thought the news a ast be "good," as well as the bearer. And, indeed, Ahimaaz durst not tell him plainly, but only said, "Blessed be God, who hath delivered up the men that lifted up their hand against my lord the king."

M vm v. Did David's usually pious heart, at ence echo these expressions of gratitude?

MARY. Oh! no; he was thinking only of his and asked, "Is the young man Absalom, safe!

MAMA. And in what cautious terms was the fatal truth at last insinuated by Cushi?

MARY. "The enemies of the king, and all that rise up against thee to do thee hurt, be as that young man." But David knew too well what this meant, and was much moved, wept, and said, "Would to God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!" Mama, bad as Absalom was, I am very sorry for David.

MAMA. God forbid you should not, my dear; the more so, that he whose eternal loss he so bitterly deplored, was not (like the innocent babe over whose cold remains he soon ceased to weep) gone a little before him, into Abraham's bosom—but had descended, according to his unconscious father's own prediction, before his "days were half numbered," "quick into the pit," "reserved for the ungodly." This no doubt it was, that so unseasonably prolonged the hopeless mourning of David. But what disheartening effect had it on the people?

MARY. They durst not enjoy their victory; and stole into the city ashamed, like people who had been beaten. But Mama! how harsh and insolent Joab always is! He scolds the king, as if he had been his servant, instead of his master.

MAMA. I hope you do not think that a change in their position, would have excused want of feeling, even to an inferior. But we must take into account the natural bluntness of Joab's character, and the greater familiarity authorized by the manners of the age, and his own near relationship. Harsh as it sounded, the advice was so substantially reasonable, that David acted on it, and once more shewed himself to his subjects.

But did he manifest any desire to avail himself of his victory, and return, like a triumphant conqueror, to Jerusalem?

MARY. Oh! no; he was too melancholy. But the people themselves began to dispute about it; and asked why "no one spoke a word of bringing back the king?"

MAMA. Thus proving, far more convincingly, that God "turned their hearts as one man" towards his now sufficiently humbled "anointed," than if the idea of resuming the throne had originated with himself. When these expressions of loyalty, however, reached him in his exile, he showed himself anxious to reserve the chief benour of his restoration to his own tribe of Judah.

By what apparently strange expedient did he succeed in gaining them over?

MARY. By promising to make "Amasa" (whom he calls his "bone and flesh") captain of the host, in place of Joab. How could he think of this, when Amasa had been Absalom's general?

MAMA. That very circumstance it was, which made it politic, (though not perhaps just) to promote the one nephew, at the expense of the other; whose lated is obedience and harsh reproaches David seems never to have forgiven. And the power, possessed and exercised over the men of Judah, by Amasa, justified the sagacity by which the step was dictated.

What event, in which a proud and vindictive mind would have found subject of exultation, if mot of severity—occurred on the king's homeward journey? But first, do you recollect any thing about "Gilgal," where all Judah came, to conduct the king over Jordan?

MARY. I hope I shall never forget it, Mama; because you told me the "twelve stones" the Israelites put up there, in the bed of the river where they went over dry, were a standing memorial of the truth of God, and the Bible.

MAMA. They are, Mary; and had no other fruit occurred from our readings together, I should have blessed God that his truth had been thus graven "as on a rock" in your memory, by even an imperfect application of the means devised by himself. While the stones of "Gilgal" stood, all Israel echoed their hourly testimony to the miraculous passage into Canaan. And when, by the lapse of ages, and the "swellings of Jordan," that perishable memorial was swept away-the significant name of "Bethabara," and the unanimous tradition of a whole nation, replaced them with a monument more indelible still. I am glad my dear, you recollected this. Associate with the remembrance the unswerving conviction, that every truth of the Bible (though resting on less of visible demonstration than the stones of "Gilgal,") is inspired by the same Spirit, and carries the same authority.

We must return to Shimei. How did th's cowardly railer abjectly seek to atone for his unmanly attack?

MARY. By coming "first of all the house of Joseph" to meet the king, and begging him to forget what he had done "perversely." I wonder he did not rather keep quiet, and hide himself; it was too bold to expect forgiveness.

MAMA. So thought Abishai the brother of Joub, and longed to be permitted to indulge his thirst for blood. But David, while seeing through, and despising the hollowness of Shimei's submission—both felt and expressed that the dearest privilege of his restored soverencity, was the power to extend pardon, and conter life.

What less pleasing office awaited him, in atoning for his own former rashness?

MARY. It seemed poor Mephibosheth, so far from wishing to be made king, had been doing nothing but mourning (that was the meaning was it not, of his going so neglected?) from the day the king went away, till he came back; so that Ziba had told a lie. I wonder David did not punish him.

MAMA. That his own rash gift of Mephibosheth's whole estate, rendered more difficult, as well as the services Ziba had unquestionally rendered to him in his recent distress. Things were therefore merely restored to their former footing; and the king's disapprobation of Ziba sufficiently marked, by his returning to administer for another, the lands he had surreptitiously obtained for himself.

But was the recovery of these uppermost in the mind of the son of Jonathan?

MARY. No, no; he said Ziba might "take all," so glad was he to see David "come again to his house in peace." And I am glad too that Jonathan's son was like his good father.

MAMA. By whom was a kindred spirit of disinterestedness manifested?

MARY. By old Barzillai, who had maintained the king all the time he was at Mahanaim; and yet, when he asked him to come and live with him at Jerusalem, said he was too old to enjoy a court, and sent his son instead.

MAMA. And never let us forget, Mary, the grounds of this refusal, (besides those of mere generosity and indifference to reward) viz: the unsuitableness to advanced age, of the vain and idle pleasures of youth; the relinquishment of which by the "hoary head," proved that to Barzillai at least, it had become a "crown of wisdom."

We must hasten over less pleasing matter—the unholy strife between Judah and Israel, about the credit of restoring the king; and the opportunity it afforded for a fresh chastisement of David, in the shape of the revolt of "Sheba." Who was he? MARY. A "Penjamite," and a "man of Belial." I think, Mama, all the bad people we read of just now, were Benjamites.

MAMA. For a natural reason, in a history of pretenders and rebels, viz.—that they were of the family and kindred of Saul.

But how were the otherwise easy measures for putting this one down, distracted by the feuds of the rival commanders?

MARY. Amasa, the new one, did not come as soon as he ought, and David bade Abishai go after Sheba; and Joab must have gone too, (though David did not tell him)—for, when Amasa met them, he pretended to be glad to see him, and stabbed him, while kissing him, with his sword. What a horrid jealous monster he was, to do so to both Abner and Amasa!

MAMA. Bear this in mind when you hear David blamed for solemnly recommending to Solomon, to take advantage of more settled times for bringing this reckless murderer to justice.

But how did Joab, in the meantime, attain his end, of being once more "over all the host?"

MARY. A wise woman betrayed Sheba to Joab, and cut off his head; and I suppose, David did not like or dare to make him answer for his murders, just when he had done this for him.

MAMA. Precisely, Mary. Worldly policy may, for a while delay the vengeance decreed by the Almighty; but in the end, it will "find the transgressor out." and fulfil the everlasting sentence pronounced against the first murderer on record, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed."

MORNING TWENTY-FIRST.

LESSON .- 21 Samuel, Chapters xxi. and xxii.

MARY. Mama, I am glad we have read the first of these chapters, because there is something in it I want explained, and I daresay you can do it for me. You know, David swore to Jonathan, that he would be kind to his children after him, and so he was to Mephibosheth; but Saul, too, made him "swear by the Lord," that he would not "cut off his seed, or destroy his name out of his father's house." I wonder, when this was the case, at David's delivering "seven men of his sons" to be "hanged up," before the very Lord to whom he had sworn, not to kill them.

MAMA. I have always begged you, my dear, when your increased attention to what you read, suggests apparent difficulties, to mention them at once—as there are few in Scripture which deeper attention still, does not enable us wholly or partially to remove. In the latter degree, at least, I think your objection (no unnatural one) to David's conduct, has been obviated. But, that you may comprehend this, we must investigate the painful transaction from the beginning.

How came any idea of judicial severity against the family of his late enemy, to be entertained at all by David—whose generous forbearance towards them had been, till now, most praiseworthy and complete?

MARY. There was a three years' "famine in the land," Mama; and when David "enquired of the Lord" about it, God answered, that it was for "Saul and his bloody house, because he slew the Gibeonites." Who were they?

MAMA. I really must refer you to our former reading for an answer to that question; as I am sure the history of the subterfuge, by which a tribe of Canaanites (amid the full tide of extermination carried on against them by Divine command) gained not only their lives, but partial admission into the "commonwealth of Israel"—was not a thing to be forgotten.

MARY. No, certainly; I remember it all now; and that to punish their deceit, in pretending to be "strangers from a far country," and not Canaanites,—they were only allowed to be "hewers of wood," and "drawers of water," to the Israelites.

MAMA. True. But, by what pledge were their forfeited lives (under these abject and humiliating conditions) saved to them?

MARY. You told me, Mama, Joshua and the princes of Israel took a rash oath, that they should live, without "enquiring of God" about it.

MAMA. Which oath—even while disapproving of its tenor—the God to whom perjury is hateful, was pleased solemnly to confirm. Now, contained the promise of mercy to the Gibeonites had been (under certain conditions requisite for the vindication of his honour) ratified—see, without indignation, its violation (from pretended zeal, for the children of Israel and Judah) by Saul?

MARY. I daresay not. But why did Saul break it by slaying them, and when?

MAMA. As no special mention occurs of the massacre, they are generally thought to have been involved in that reckless slaughter of God's priests (whose attendants, you know, they were in the more servile offices of the sanctuary,) which took place in consequence of the treachery of "Doeg, the Edomite;" during which we are told, that Saul "smote in Nob, the city of the priests, both men, and women, and children, and sucklings, and oxen, and asses, and sheep, with the edge of the sword."

MARY. I see now why God was so angry about the Gibconites. But when David inquired what he could do for those who remained, to make up for it—I think they shewed themselves deceitful still; for they first said he should "not for them kill any man in Israel;" and then asked for seven of Saul's sons that they might hang them.

MAMA. Our translation, Mary, does certainly lay them open to the imputation of having added insincerity, to a thirst for retribution, pardonable in an uncivilized and only half-converted people. But the margin of our Bible (that frequent solver of verbal difficulties) gives us as the more accurate sense, that it did not "pertain," or "belong" to them to "kill," or condenin "any man in Israel;" for which reason, they came to demand justice from the king.

Let us now see how far—in granting what the existing law of "life for life" rendered an equitable demand,—David forfeited his engagements either to Saul or Jonathan. Those to the latter you have yourself admitted he strictly kept; and the idea some people have been wicked enough to throw out, that the demand was a device suggested by David, as a pretext for destroying (from political motives) the race of his late foe—is utterly rebutted by the simple fact, that Mephibosheth, Saul's only rightful heir, had already a son called

"Micah," grown up; through whom he ultimately became (as we find by the Chronicles) the father of no less than one hundred and fifty recorded descendants! But while these, or any of them, might have proved formidable competitors for the throne-none of the "seven" (selected by David, as if his special object had been to preserve, instead of annihilating the direct line of Saul) could interfere with his promise, to "keep up his name in la facher's house." The two born of an "handmaid," were by that circumstance set aside. Nor could the five sons of Saul's daughter, "called after," and "keeping up the name" of their alien father-come in any respect under that "oath of the Lord," which, we are expressly told, had induced David, at the greatest personal risk to spare Mephibosheth.

I have dwelt longer on this than usual; but as you yourself seemed to see doubts in the passage, I was not sorry to take the opportunity of shewing you how capable they were of simple explanation.

But by what amiable trait, in unison with his wonted generosity, did David prove that justice, not enmity, was at the bottom of this act of retribution?

MARY. He buried the bones of those that were hanged by the Gibconites; and was at the pains to get back Saul and Jonathan's bones from the people of Jabesh-Gilead, that they might all be buried together in the sepulchre of Kish, Saul's father. This was very right and handsome in David: but what first made him think of it. I daresay, was the behaviour of the poor mother whom I have so often felt for—sitting watching her dead sons, and keeping the birds off them by day, and the wild beasts off them by night! Why did she do this, "til the rain dropped on them from heaven!"

MAMA. Because not till this gracious token of God's removal of the drought which had occasioned the famine—were the victims of His displeasure permitted to be consigned to the sepulchre of that father, whose "sins" were thus, in the "third generation," remarkably "visited." Then, and not till then, is it said, "God was entreated for the land."

But what narrow escape did David shortly after make, in an expedition against the Philistines?

MARY. One of the sons of the "giant," (I suppose it means Goliath,) "thought to have slain David, for he had waxed faint;" but Abishai, the son of Zeruiah, succoured him. I think Abishai was the best of them, Mama; we never hear of his doing any thing so bad as Joab.

MAMA. No: though his natural ferocity betrayed itself more than once; in his anxiety to "smite Saul," when asleep in his tent, and his eagerness to silence, by the sword, the revilings of Shinaci. But here he only acted the part of a faithful and gallant servant.

Do you recollect any other instance (besides his volunteering to accompany David into Saul's care, ) in which his bravery and devotion to his chice, were romantically displayed? It occurred in a chapter where a press of more important matter, put it out of our power to notice the touching episode,—honourable alike to all parties.

Turn to the 11th chapter of 1st Chronicles, at the 17th verse, and see what is there recorded as having happened, during a former contest with the Philistines; while they yet possessed the fortress of Bethlehem, and David was in his old refuge, the cave at Adullam?

MARY. "David longed, and said, Oh that one would give me to drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem, that is by the gate!" Mama, what could put this wish in his head?

"MAMA. I thought I had made you aware of the value of water generally, in a "thirsty land" like Judea; but that of the "well of Bethlehem" where most likely he had often as a boy, watered his flock—was endeared to David by many a youthful recollection. Was this inconsiderately expressed "longing" gratified?

MARY. Oh! yes. His three captains broke through the host of the Philistines, and drew water, and brought it to him. But he said, God forbid he should drink it, as they had brought it at the jeopardy of their lives—and he "poured it out unto God." I would not have lost this story for the world! It makes one like David better than ever, and shews how much he was beloved.

MAMA. Yes, and how worthy he was of such affectionate devotion! But you have not told me who was the "chief of the three" who thus risked their lives to give a momentary pleasure to their leader?

MARY. Oh! Abishai! I shall always think better of him too.

MAMA. And feel indebted, I hope, to the sacred writers, for preserving to us such minute traits of individual character, as enable us doubly to sympathize in the fate of the persons of whom they are related.

But we must return to our second chapter, en tirely consisting of a hymn of praise; partly conposed long before, on occasion of David's repeated deliverances from Saul—but now revised, and applied to his more recent victory, and restoration.

With what solemn recognition of the Divine protection does it open?

MARY. "I will love thee, O Lord my strength.
The Lord is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer; my God, my strength, in whom I will trust; my buckler, the horn of my salvation, and my high tower."

I. Yet y understand all the comparisons used in this verse, Mama, except that about the "horn of salvation;" and yet it strikes me you have spoken of it before.

MAMA. It has occurred before in our reading, as it frequently does in Scripture; where "exalting," or "lifting up" the "horn" is synonymous with granting victory, or promotion. It was derived, I told you, from a head-dress (confined to occasions of parade and triumph) composed of gold, and much resembling a horn in shape.

MARY. Oh! I remember you said somebody had seen it still worn in Abyssinia.

MAMA. Yes, Bruce the traveller; who had the pleasure of first practically illustrating this Scripture expression.

But let us mark, as we glance over them, the singular appropriateness of those used in this beautiful hymn, to the recent perils, and escapes of the Psalmist; of the "floods of ungodly men," to the rebel host by whom he was lately "made afraid"—of the "sorrows of hell," to his late bitter agony and remorse—and of the "snares of death," to the subtle and traitorous counsels, which the mercy of the God unto whom, in his "distress he cried," could alone have frustrated!

The lofty and inimitable description of the glory and majesty of Jehovah, which is next introduced—speaks for itself; and is incapable of being heightened by any force of uninspired comment. It has been admired as the triumph of poetry, by those, blind alas! to the magnitude of the truths it conveys.

But no sooner does gratitude for personal deliverance again resume the place of general tributes to the "Majesty on High"—than we perceive the special propriety of the images, and their relation to their writer's individual circumstances. Well might be say he had been "drawn" by a hand from above "out of many waters," and "delivered from his strong enemy" (Absalom.) and "from them which hated him," (Ahithophel) and from those who took advantage of his "day of calamity," (even Shimei) but threatened by all of whom, "the Lord alone was his stay."

Passing over a whole accumulation of highly poetical imagery, significative of the aid and protection, on various occasions, of his God—we must hasten to notice, towards the close, a prediction, which we shall in our next reading, see literally fulfilled.

What does David say will be the immediate consequence, of the Lord's recent deliverance of him from civil war and rebellion—significantly expressed, by the "strivings of the people?"

MARY. "Thou hast made me the head of the heathen: a people whom I have not known shall serve me."

"As soon as they hear of me they shall obeyme, the managers shall submit themselves unto me."

MAMA. Bear this in mind (even while remembering its higher and more remote application to the Messiah's kingdom) when we come to read of the alliance, sought with David by the powerful king of Tyre, and the ample tribute paid by him, of the valuable produce of his country, for the Temple of the yet "unknown God" of Israel.

The resolution of David that such He should no longer remain if it were in his power to extend the knowledge of His might and goodness, "Therefore will I give thanks to thee, O Lord, among the heathen, and sing praises unto thy name,"—is worthy of the piety and benevolence of him by whom it was uttered; and may serve as an example to Christians, who, in addition to that knowledge of the one true God, which it was the ardent wish of David to disseminate—have it in their power to confer on "nations sitting in darkness," the yet more inestimable gift, of subjection to the "Saviour" to whom David here unconsciously alludes, and an interest in that "Seed," in whom alone it can truly be said, that God "sheweth mercy, for evermore!"

MORNING TWENTY-SECOND.

Lasson.-1st Chronicles, Chapters xxi. and xxii.

Marty. I am quite anxious, Mama, to have the chapters we have just read, explained to me. I know David's numbering the people must have been a great sin, since the devil provoked him to do it, and God punished it so awfully; but the reason that made it wicked, is not so plain as usual—though I am sure you will make it so presently.

MAMA. I am glad you think so, my dear,—such confidence cannot but be grateful to a mother's heart; though I searcely ever feel more deeply the extent of my own ignorance, than when attempting to enlighten the yet greater darkness of another. But happily for us both, the loftiest human intellect, guided and enlightened by aid from above—has been for centuries employed on the elucidation of Scripture; and difficulties which perplexed the pious of past ages, are long since removed from the path of the more favoured child of our own day. The result of their labours will enable me, I hope, with the blessing of God, to convince you, that the worse than useless enumeration of his subjects by David, (which even the unscrupulous Joab remonstrated against as sinful) was not only so in God's sight, as the offspring of pride; but involved the violation, on the part of both king and people, of a direct Divine command.

MARY. Mama, even I could see it was done out of pride; and that I know is hateful to God.

MAMA. But what disposition, if possible yet more offensive to Him (in His character of "Lord of Hosts,") did it manifest; in direct opposition to the juster sentiments expressed, (before encountering, with a single companion, a whole Philistine garrison,) by his friend Jonathan? Do you remember them?

MARY. Yes; you made me remark them. He said it was all the same to God, "to save by many, or by few."

MAMA. And so David thought and felt, when pursuing with four hundred men, the countless host of Amalekite spoilers! But where is the human heart, which the severest trials can entirely divest of unbelief; or in which a brief sunshine of restored prosperity does not foster, and cherish, the congenial growth of pride!

When he, who with "five smooth stones from the brock," had defied, in the strength of his God, the accursed Philistine—lived to put (in defiance of his own pious precept) "his trust in chariots and horses," and his "safety in the number of an host"—surely all confidence in the stability of unassisted human virtue, must be felt to be more vain, and groundless still!

But to impress this salutary conviction more stron; 'y on our minds, we must minutely follow up our painful inquiry. In what mild and persuasive terms (wholly at variance with his usual harshness) did Joab plead with his uncle against the measure?

MARY. He said, "Now the Lord thy God add unto the people (how many soever they be) an hundred fold, and that the eyes of the king may see it; but why doth my lord, the king, delight in this thing?" He does not say, however, why he and the "captains of the host" were so much against it; else perhaps David might have been persuaded.

MAMA. He does not indeed give his reason kere, Mary, but (observe the use, as I have often remarked, of parallel passages)—in the corresponding part of the book of Samuel, he adds, "why will the king be a cause of trespass to Israel?"

important words, as we shall find, proving that Joab at least was fully aware in what the "transgression," so severely punished, lay; and that it was not for light reasons that the "king's word" (as we read in Samuel) was "abominable unto Joab."

The ground of these strong expressions, fully justified by the subsequent indignation of the Lord—I will now explain to you.

In that book of "God's law," Mary, which David (in his holier hours) indited the whole 119th psalm, as well as many others, to "exalt and magnify,"-in which he says, it was his " delight to meditate day and night,"-which he professes to take " for a lamp to his feet, and a light to his path,"-which he declares he had "hid in his heart, that he might not sin against God;" the testimonies of which he had taken for his "counsellors," and every precept of which, concerning all things he estremed to be so right," that "rivers of tears ran down his eyes," because of their infraction by others: In this book, of which none in Judea, from the prince to the peasant, could plead other than wilful ignorance-was recorded this express command.

"When thou takest the sum of the children of Israelaftertheirnumber, then shall they give every man a ransom for his soul unto the Lord, that there be no plague amongst them when thou numberest them.

"Thus shall they give, every one half a shekel, after the shekel of the sanctuary, one half shekel shall be the offering of the Lord.

"The rich shall not give more, and the poor shall not give less; when they give an offering unto the Lord, to make atonement for your souls.

" And thou shalt take the atonement money of the children of Israel, and shalt appoint it for the service of the tabernacle of the congregation; that it may be a memorial unto the children of Israel before the Lord, to make an atonement for your souls."

MARY. Mama! I am quite astonished that any one should wonder now at David's being punished, and the people too, if the atonement money was neither asked nor paid. Surely every one does not know that this solemn command was in the Bible!

MAMA. No, Mary; scoffers do not choose to know it, because it defeats their blasphemous purpose; the irreligious know or "care for none of these things;" and alas! many slothful Christians prefer remaining in uncomfortable doubts respecting the wisdom and justice of God's dealings with men, to "searching the Scriptures daily, to see whether these things be so." Let us bless God that the search has been made, and the key found; and though it might rather surprise us that the "ways which are not as out ways," and the "thoughts raised as high above our thoughts" as the "heaven is higher than the earth," should be capable of accommodation to our finite understandings—let us gratefully accept the edification resulting from a condescension, as unexpected, as it is undeserved.

To return to our now too intelligible history of sin and chastisement. Do we find in it the slightest intimation, of the recognition, on the part of king or people, of the Divine requirement of a ransom—one so congenial, we might have thought, to the usually pious and grateful feelings of David?

MARY. Not a word. I suppose they either forgot or were too proud to pay it.

MAMA. And in either case—the latter I fear was the more criminal and likely one—were justly involved in one national punishment.

But after nine months (nearly the same period as on his former transgression) of unaccountable impenitence—what effect had the prodigious, though yet incompletely taken numerical strength of his kingdom, on the heart of its monarch? We its pride gratified, as he expected, by the result?

MARY. Oh! no; "his heart smote him," and he "said unto the Lord, I have sinned greatly, and now I beseech thee, O Lord, take away the iniquity of thy servant, for I have done very foolishly."

MAMA. And such, remember, Mary, is the usue and inclancholy result of those darling sim, of which an apostle might well ask, "What fruit had ye then, in those things, whereof ye are now ashamed!"

Who was sent this time, in the room of good Nathan, to confirm the convictions of the repentant king?

MARY. The prophet "Gad, David's seer." Mama; since he had a prophet, to inquire of, he might have known long since, that the thing was sinful.

MAMA. Nay, Mary; by how many among ourselves, who have, like David, "Moses and the prophets"—do both remain unconsulted and eunthought of! And never forget on what high authority, their condition is represented as, in most cases, defying miracle itself.

But to David a miracle of "mercy" was, "in the midst of judgment," extended. What was MARY. He was allowed to choose his own punishment, and say whether he would have three years famine—three months defeat before his enemies—or three days of the visword of the Lord, even the positionee, destroying through all the reasts of Israel. No wonder David was vin a great strait," Matta, but I think he was quite right to choose rather to fall into the hand of God, who is no reiful—than into the hand of man.

Mass. Can you discover no other reason, which made it "right" for David in humility to make choice of the "plague" rather than any of the other afflictive dispensations?

Mans. Oh! I know what you mean. A "plague" was just what God had threatened should be "among the people," if they neglected to pay the ransom "for their souls."

Mass. It was; and no "atonement" could now be made by the penitent monarch for himself and his people, more acceptable or becoming, than submissive acquiescence in the precise chassissement memoral by their joint disobedience.

But, in what affecting terms does he invoke on himself, as the greater sinner-indeed the sole cause of the national delinquency—the chief burden of the merited penalty?

WARY. Oh! Mama, it is very affecting, and, "ke David; he says," Is it not I that commanded the people to be numbered; even I it is that have himed, and done evil indeed; but these hear, what have they done?

Mana. Ay, Mary; how different were now the surenous, and how different had been the conduct of this faithless "shepherd of the flock," while betraying into sin and peril, the "many thousands of Israel"—from those which swelled his breast, and animated his youthful courage, when rescuing "from the paw of the lion and the bear," his father's "few sheep in the wilderness!"

How many of his helpless people paid the forfeit of their lives to the violated law of God?

Many. "Seventy thousand," Mama. No wonder David and the elders of Israel were "clothed in sackcloth," or, that they "fell on their faces," when they saw the "angel of the Lord s'anding between earth and heaven, having as drawn sword in his hand, stretched out over Jerusalem."

MAMA. There is a "sword," Mary, which will one day be "girded on the thigh" of David's far higher than angelic descendant—the thought of whose stroke (which no penitence will then be able to disarm) this visible representation of the delegated wrath of heaven, should assist us to remember, and avert!

By what means was the hand of the destroyer now " staved?"

MARY. By David's prayer, I suppose, Mama: and God's mercy.

MAMA. Was nothing more prescribed, in the way of atonement? No recognition of the great truth, that "without shedding of blood" there was then, as now, no "remission" of sins?

MARY. Oh! yes. The angel commanded Gad to tell David to "set up an altar to the Lord," in the very thrashing-floor where the thing happened.

MAMA. And did David, though king of Israel, immediately take possession of the property of the affrighted "Jebusite;" who, with his sons, had hid themselves from the presence of the angel?

Mary. No, no. Though this stranger (who seems to have been a good man) was willing to give not only the "floor," but the oxen, and thrashing instruments besides, for nothing, to the king—David would not "take that which was another's," even for God—nor "offer burnt-offerings without cost."

Myax. Or as it is yet more explicitly—and call Mary, usefully and edifyingly expressed, in Samuel—" neither will I offer burnt-offerings to my God, of that which doth cost me nothing;" as those do among ourselves, who make a virtue of abstaining from sins, and sacrificing pleasures, to which, from natural temper, they feel little temptation.

At what price, on the contrary, far beyond the possible value—did David purchase the hallewed ground and its appendages?

MARY. "Six hundred shekels of gold by weight." What a price for a poor man's thrashing floor!

MAMA. Not too great surely, Mary, for the future site of the proud temple of Jerusalem, and the scene of a national deliverance, from one of the greatest, and most deserved of national judgments!

When was the Lord at last entreated for the people, and the sword of the still visible angel, restored to its scabbard?

Mary. Not till David had "offered both burnt offerings and peace offerings," on the "altar" God had ordered him to "set up;" and till God had answered him from heaven by "fire."

MAMA. Nor did the sword of the avenger remain thus long unsheathed, save to impress on future ages the indelible lesson—that till the great sacrifice, by which alone atonement is made, and peace purchased, is applied to our guilt in the way prescribed by God—the decree of eternal death gone out against every sinning child of Atlam, remains in unmitigated severity—ready to fall (though for a time restrained by him who "willeth not that any should perish") on the heads of all, "who neglect so great salvation."

MARY. Thank you for making this all so plain. But why was David "afraid" to worship at Gibeon, "because of the sword of the angel of the Lord?" One would have thought the place where he had actually been seen—more awful.

MAMA. And so it was, Mary: and for that reason, did David confine his future worship to the spot—so miraculously rendered "holyground"—and evidently selected by the Lord as the site of his future sanctuary.

But let us hail with pleasure (after so much to distress and appal) the quickening effect of affliction, on the zeal and piety of David. Do you remember what he himself remarks on this subject? "Before I was afflicted, I went astray, but now have I kept thy word."

In what commendable preparations did his revived devotion manifest itself?

MARY. Gathering workmen and materials for the "house of God"—because Solomon his son was "young and tender"—and the house "and the of fame and glory throughout all countries."

MAMA. And so, indeed, by the blessing of God, it proved! But what corroboration do you find in the list of materials provided,—of our yesterday's remark as to David's influence over foreign countries?

Mark. "The Zidonians and they of Tyre brought much cedar-wood to David. Was this very scarce, Mama?

MAMA. Cedars were then, as since, chiefly to be found on Mount Lebanon, which has derived from these trees much of its celebrity, as they, in return, have borrowed from it their name. This mountain lay in the otherwise limited territory of "Tyre," whose monarch's great power, chiefly derived (like our own) from maritime commerce,—we shall find cheerfully enlisted, through respect for David—in the service of Solomon his son.

MARY. Mama were quite right about the wars of David being one reason why God would not let him build the temple. He says himself, that it was because he had "shed much blood upon earth in God's sight."

MAMA. A decided proof, Mary, that even just and permitted warfare, (like that of David) is in the eye of the God of peace, a necessary evil; as the crection of his chosen sanctuary, during the reign of a purposely pacific monarch—shadows forth the future triumphs of the gospel of peace—when "nation shall not rise up against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

Among the many excellent advices here given by the declining monarch, to his highly favoured son—can you discern one evidently referring to his own late unhappy infraction of a Divine command?

MARY. Distinctly, Mama. He says, "Then shalt thou prosper, if thou takest heed to fulfil the statutes and judgments, which the Lord charged Moses concerning the ch'ldren of Israel,"—and you know it was just one of them which David had paid so dear for breaking.

MAMA. True; and where do we find a confirmation of the assertion, that it was "good for him to have been afflicted?"

MARY. When he says, it was "in his trouble" that he prepared such great things "for the house of the Lord."

MAMA. The result of the counsels given by him, not to Solomon only, but to the lately faulty "princes of Israel,"—it will be gratifying for us to trace, in the unparalleled energy and liberality, with which the darling purpose of David's heart was carried into effect.

Let us close our reading with the concluding words of this animating address.-"Set your heart and soul to seek the Lord your God. Arise, therefore, and build ye the sanctuary of the Lord. Is not the Lord your God with you?"-an admonition adapted alike to the Israelite of old, and the Christian of our day; to the latter of whom L. committed—conjointly with a Divine artificer and founded "on the rock that is higher than he"-the erection of a nobler structure, than the boasted temple of Solomon; even that "building up of himself in his most holy faith," by which our "vile bodies" can become the "temples of the Holy Ghost"-and the whole fabric of the united Christian community, "fitly framed together, groweth up" into "an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

MORNING TWENTY-THIRD.

LESSON.—1st Chronicles, Chapters xxviii and xxix.

Mama. We have, in these chapters, a most pleasing and every-way characteristic account, of the means adopted by the pious monarch of Israel, in his declining years, for securing to his people, after him, the blessings of good government; and for impressing on his youthful successor, the fundamental principle of his own sovereignty that—"the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."

How worthy of David is the superiority to petty jealousies, (too often entertained even by parents towards those who are to succeed them) which prompted the inauguration during his own life, of the son whom "God had chosen" to sit upon his throne! And how noble, as well as pious, is the recognition thus distinctly made, that "it is by the Lord, kings reign," and that the "kingdoms of the earth are His," and, that from Him, as its only legitimate source, come the "power and might," and "honour," of princes. To whatever source these may by others be referred, let us, at least, "always remember," with pious David, that it is "in the hand of God, to make great, and to give strength unto all."

But we must accompany him regularly through the solemn measure by which the close of his chequered life was adorned and dignified. To whom did he deem it proper to announce the decision of the Almighty respecting the succession of Soleman?

MARY. The "princes of Israel, and the princes of the tribes," and captains, and stewards, and officers, and "mighty and valiant men."

MAMA. Yes; **qn short, all those whose weight and authority in the kingdom, rendered their being apprized of the Divine intention, a matter of propriety—though not even with such, did it lie to dispute or to confirm it.

How beautiful are the terms in which the venerable monarch addresses this imposing assembly of the rank, and wisdom, and valour, of his kingdom,—his more aged contemporaries among whom, he calls his "brethren," and the younger, who had grown up under his paternal sway,—his "people!"

But, does even the pleasing subject of the exaltation of the favourite son of his love and of his old age, occupy the first place in his address?

MARY. No. He first tells them, that it had been "in his heart" to build "an house of rest for the ark of the Lord, and for the footstool of their God,"—but that God had not allowed him to fulfil it. And you know, Mama, we saw yesterday that it was because of his wars and bloodshed.

MAMA. Yes; and we have it again on his own unquestionable authority. But beware of the wilful error which has led some to exult over, as a stigma on the pardoned "blood-guiltiness" of David—a prohibition expressly founded on the sanguinary character of his warlike reign.

How remarkably does he go on, ascribing "honour to whom" alone "honour is due"—a truth too oft n lost sight of?

MARY. He reminds them, that God had first "chosen Judah to be the ruler, and of Judah, the house of his father, and among the sons of his father, liked him, to make him king over all Israel."

Mama. And could any chain of reasoning, founded on known facts, better prepare them for the recognition of Jehovah's unquestionable right, to select from among the "many sons"—the gift of whom, from the same hand, David gratefully acknowledges—his younger son, Solomon, to sit after him on the throne? But, to place this beyond the possibility of cavil, what is that throne emphatically here called?

MARY. The "throne of the kingdom of the Lord over Israel."

MAMA. And on what conditions had He, who "doeth as he will in all the kingdoms of the earth," promised to "establish" the delegated sovereignty of Solomon?

MARY. If he should be "constant to do God's commandments and judgments."

MAMA. And in what manner (do we learn from the next verse) should a monarch, thus laudably disposed, be seconded by a loyal people?

MARY. "Now therefore, in the sight of all Israel, the congregation of the Lord, and in the audience of our God, keep and seck for all the commandments of the Lord your God." Mama, I think I know why David says, "seek for" here, because, for want of "seeking," you know they had lately forgotten all about the atonement for their souls.

MAMA. A good conjecture! and, at all events, an admonition never to be too strongly enforced.

But, turning from the people thus solemnly admonished, how affectionately does the heart of the father pour out upon the head of his darling son, the invaluable result of a life of discipline and experience in the ways of God! Read me entire, this epitome of wisdom, derived from heavenly teaching, during seventy years of unparalleled vicissitude.

MARY. "And thou, Solomon, my son, know thou the God of thy father, and serve him with a perfect heart and willing mind; for the Lord searcheth all hearts, and understandeth the imaginations of the thoughts.

"If thou seek him, he will be found of thee; but if thou forsake him, he will cast thee off for ever."

MAMA. Let this admonition, Mary, be graved in your heart. Nor let the merciful provision made in the blessed Gospel, for the possible return of those who have once forsaken their God, to his throne of mercy—be made an "occasion of sin," by the more enlightened Christian.

To what work of piety does David, as his first kingly duty, direct his son's attention?

MARY. "The house of God's sanctuary," and he gave his son the "pattern" of everything about it.

Mama. Where had this shepherd-warrior—this man of toilsome and perpetual wanderings and conflicts, acquired a knowledge of the arts of peace, and science of decoration, which made the building constructed by his directions, a model to all nations, and the "praise of the whole earth?"

MARY. Oh! he had all the pattern "by the Spirit," and he says, a little further on, that "the Lord made him understand it in writing by his hand." How could that be!

MAMA. Is this the first time that a literal example of a similar divine communication is nontioned in Scripture?

MARY. No. The commandments on the tables of stone, were written "by the finger of God;" and it says God shewed a pattern of the tabernacle also, to Moses, up in the mount.

MAMA. The whole transaction is, in both cases, expressed under material imagery to adapt it to our comprehension. But while "hand," and "finger," are manifestly terms inapplicable to "Him who is a spirit"—and as a "spirit" only, can manifest himself unto men—yet it is surely as easy to conceive of His power being exercised, to call into existence precise models for an earthly structure—as to summon into being, and reduce to form, the very elements of which that earth is composed.

From the inestimable value, and minute application under express Divine sanction, of the treasures of gold and silver devoted by the pious heart of David, to the adornment of God's sanctuary—we may draw a deep, and enduring lesson. Are such costly embellishments exacted by Him, as indispensible to, or even acceptable in his external service?

MARY. No. His churches are too many, to be so fine; and besides, we know that He does not care now, for gold and silver.

MAMA. But why did He cver "care for them" Mary-(to borrow your childish, but I hope not irreverent expression?) Why did the Lord of heaven and earth, under a darker and preliminary dispensation, promulgated among a gross and carnal people-exact, and receive with every testimony of approbation—the costliest offerings it was in that people's power to bestow? and bid them deck his chosen sanctuary, with all that was most "rich and rare" from amid the profusion of his own illimitable bounty? Was it, think you, that the Christian, of after and more enlightened times, might "serve him with that which cost him nothing?" Did the God for whose house of old, mines were ransacked, by His own command, till the "pure gold" (alone reckoned worthy of being there employed) was so profusely lavished, that "silver was not any thing accounted of, and was as the stones of the streets for abundance"-intend to shadow forth by this earthly splendour, no future spiritual tribute, more precious, and (to the wayward heart of man) involving greater self-denial than dedicated heaps of perishable gold? Depend upon it Mary, that He who now dispenses alike with riches, and with sacrifice—will be content with no less an offering, than the "hearts which he hath made;" and that by the "pure gold" with which the meanest vessels in the sanctuary of old were at least externally coated (if not actually composed)—is typified that spotless and inestimable "covering" of a more perfect righteousness—by which alone the Christian worshipper is fitted to appear before God.

But was the hierality with which the costlicst offerings were "prepared" for the future dwelling of Jehovah—" of his own proper good," by him who had "set his affections on the house of his God"—confined to David?

MARY. No, no. The "chief of the fathers and princes," and all the great men, offered willingly, "and all the people rejoiced because with perfect heart they offered willingly to the Lord—and David the king also rejoiced with great joy."

MAMA. And has no memorial of this ray of pious joy, by which the declining years of David's perturbed life were cheered and gilded—come down to urge and animate us, to similar alacrity in God's service?

MARY. Yes, the beautiful prayer which David made to God, first, for giving them every good thing, and then, for "putting it in their hearts" to return Him a part of what was "all his own."

MAMA. And can we read it, Mary, and admire, as all must do, its unfeigned humility—"Lord, who am I, and what is my people?"—its heartfelt gratitude—"for all things come of thee, and of thine own have we given thee"—its acknowledgement of the Divine supremacy, "Thine O Lord, is the greatness, and the power, and the glory, and the victory, and the majesty"—and the devout concluding wish, "O Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and of Israel our fathers—keep this for ever in the imagination of the thoughts of the heart of thy people, and prepare their heart unto thee"—and not feel disposed to echo it, with all a Christian's added warmth and fervour?

Is there indeed any temporal "good thing" bestowed on the Israelites of old—any profusion, however great, of perishable silver and gold—which can for a moment compare with the richer treasures of knowledge, and civilization, and peace, showered down by the same Almighty hand, on the happier race, among whom it is our good fortune to be born? Or do not even these, sink utterly eclipsed, before the bright and glorious realities of that heavenly temple above, in whose building and adernment, every Christian is summoned—like the Jews of old—to be a "willing" participator? For these, may it indeed be said to us, as unto them—"Now bless the Lord your God?" and well may we—even as they, "bless the Lord God of our fathers, bow down our heads, and worship, and rejoice!"

But what important event of a temporal nature was appropriately ushered in by the joyful sacrific which followed David's prayer?

MARY. It says "they made Solomon king the second time and anointed him." When was he made king before?

MAMA. This alludes to his public designation, to the kingly office, mentioned in our former chapter—which would in all probability have been considered quite sufficient to ensure his peaceful succession, on his father's death, to the vacant throne—but for a distressing revolt and usurpation, (noticed in the book of Kings) attempted by his now eldest brother, Adonijah.

Into the particulars of this it is not necessary minutely to enter. Suffice it that this young man, next in order of birth to Absalom, (whom in beauty and presumption he resembled) closely imitated him in his mad career of rebellion—saying, "I will be king"—" preparing him horses and chariots"—and under the cover of sacrifice. drawing to his standard many of the chief persons in Israel—among others alas! the hitherto faithful, though sanguinary Joab—and (sad to relate) Abiathar the priest—whose wanderings with the 'cphod' in the train of the persecuted David, had long been rewarded by the highest office in the restored and beautified sanctuary!

But, this rash insurrection having been happile terminated, by the prudent interposition with aged king, of Nathan the prophet and Bathsheba—and the magnanimous pardon by Solom—if his ambitious brother—we must return to what is here further said, of the inauguration of the future king of Israel.

MARY. "He sat on the throne as king, ir stead of David his father, and prospered, and Israel obeyed him.

"And the Lord magnified Solomon exceedingly, in the sight of all Israel."

MAMA. We will reserve for our next reading, the account of his hitherto unequalled majesty; and the splendid inauguration hymn, in which, though penned in the fondness of parental partiality, by David—"great things" concerning a "greater far than Solomon," are unconsciously uttered.

But surely we cannot close the history of David—" with his reign, and his might, and the times that went over him"—without easting a brief glance back over the chequered life, we have so minutely, and I trust, edifyingly traced. And how can we better sum this up, than in his own beautiful and impressive picture, beginning from (or rather before) the cradle, and terminating in a vista of glory, extending beyond the grant!

Thine eyes did see my substance, being yet imperfect, and in thy book, all my members were critten.

- "Thou art he that took me out of the womb; theu didst make me hope, when I was on my mother's breast
- "I laid me down and slept, I awaked, for the Lord sustained me.
- "Thou hast searched me and known me, thou compassest my path, and art acquainted with all my ways.
- "Thou didst chuse David thy servant, and took him from the sheep-folds.
- "Thou didst teach my hands to war, and my fingers to fight.
- "Thou saidst, I have found David my servant, and with my holy oil I have anointed him.

- "For God is the judge, he putteth down one, and setteth up another.
- "Thou hast maintained my cause, and my right; thou sattest on thy throne, judging right.
- "False witnesses rose against me, they laid to my charge things I knew not.
- "They returned me evil for good, to the spoiling of my soul.
- "In my distress I called on the Lord, and cried unto my God: he heard my voice from his temple, and my cry came up before him.
- "He delivered me from my strong enemy, and from them which hated me.
- "He brought me forth into a large place, he delivered me, because he delighted in me.
- "Lord! by thy favour thou hadst made my mountain to stand strong; thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled.
- "The sorrows of hell compassed me about, the snares of death prevented me.
- "But I acknowledged my sin unto thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid, and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin.
- "For this shall every one that is godly, pray unto thee in a time when thou mayst be found.
- "The Lord has chastened me sore, but he hath not delivered me over unto death.
  - "I have preached righteousness in the great congregation; I have not refrained my lips, O Lord, thou knowest.

- "The Lord hath sworn in truth to David, of the fruit of thy body, will I set on thy throne.
- "Behold thou hast made my days as an handbreadth, surely every man in his best estate is altogether vanity.
- "My flesh and heart faileth, but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever."

MORNING TWENTY-FOURTH.

LESSON .- Psalm lxxii. 2d Chron. Chapters i. ii. and iii.

MAMA. We could not more appropriately, or edifyingly usher in the record of the singular favour with which the young monarch of Israel was regarded by God—than by reading entire, as we have done, the beautiful hymn of mingled supplication and triumph, in which his pious father poured out his dying acknowledgments to the God of his own salvation; and unconsciously, perhaps, caught through the dim veil of his immediate successor's earthly glories, a glimpse of the spiritual reign of that "greater than Solomon," to whose "kingdom" it is, by Christians, unanimously applied.

There are few things in Scripture which will more amply repay our study than the gradual manner in which, in this sublime composition, its pious author is borne, by the Holy Spirit, beyond the simple parental aspirations after heavenly wisdom for his mortal offspring, with which it opens, and the true though glowing description of the future prosperity and extent of his dominion—to expressions towards its close, too inapplicable to human character or sovereignty to have been uttered (even by a parent) in reference to any but that illustrious "Seed"—by whose very lips, it was ages after, unanswerably asked, "If David calleth him 'Lord,' how then is he his son?"

The primary fulfilment of the earlier portion of the hymn, in the "righteous judgment,"—" abundare of peace,"—and "dominion from sea to sea,"—of the literal son of David—as well as the homage paid to his supremacy by the kings of Tarshish and the Isles," and the voluntary gifts of the more distant queen of Sheba—will soon be before us; and ought to be gratefully traced by the Christian, as a pleasing earnest of the yet uncompleted, but far more extensive and enduring glories of the kingdom of Him, whose "name shall be continued as long as the sun"—in whom "all men shall be blessed"—and whom "all nations" will one day unite in calling "blessed."

What conclusive proof does our first chapter afford, that it was not in vain David had with dying breath implored, "Give the king thy judgments, O God: and thy righteousness unto the king's son?

MARY. Because, Mama, Solomon must have had wisdom from God, even before he himself asked it; else he could not have made so wise a choice.

MAMA. True; not even the counsels of Nathan, and example of David, unaided by a higher power, would have thus early taught the heart of the young king, the lesson he has left to the youth of all ages, "Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, for she is more precious than rubies; and all the things that thou canst desire are not to be compared to her."

But we are not left to infer the prevalence of a "right spirit," and of that "fear of the Lord which is the beginning of wisdom" in Solomon. How were they visibly manifested?

MARY. By his "gathering all the congregation of Israel, and offering a thousand burnt offerings on the brazen altar at Gibeon." This was very right, Mama; but how strange that the "tabernacle" and "altar" should still be there, and the ark at Jerusalem!

MAMA. On this point, all the researches of commentators have failed to inform us; but that the "place was holy," and the sacrifice an accepted one, the vision vouchsafed on the spot to Solomon, sufficiently proves. Was the "wisdom," thus made his "early only choice," the sole gift conferred upon the young king, by "Him who giveth liberally, and upbraideth not?"

MARY. No. Because he had "not asked riches, or wealth, or honour, or long life," God was to give them to him, "such as none of the bing had that were before him, nor should any ther him have the like."

M 1914. What a noble rebuke is here indirectly given, to the covetousness, and ambition, and selfishness, by which human wishes are general animated in so lamentable a degree—when the absence from the heart, of base and sordid desires, is made by God the express ground of a munificence, the more boundless for being unsolicited!

What remarkable admonition of our Lord, testifies to the Christian, that the Divine estimate of a wise object of pursuit, is the "same yesterday, to-day, and for ever?"

MARY. I can't think of one just at this moment; do tell me.

MAMA. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness—and all these things" (worldly comforts and necessaries) "shall be added unto you."

The extent to which the united promise of wisdom and greatness, was fulfilled in the case of Solomon—might have been gathered (even had the scripture record of them perished) from the reverential, nay, superstitious esteem in which his name is yet held in every eastern country; where not only is his fame—a rare thing for a pacific monarch—extolled above that of mighty conquerors—but in addition to earthly sway, supernatural dominion, (by his wisdom and spells) over the spirits of earth and air—is ignorantly ascribed to him.

MARY. Mama; what did Solomon, who had no wars, want with so many chariots and horses? Was it not wrong to have them?

MAMA. Superfluous, perhaps; though as his pacific reign deprived him of any temptation to "put his trust in them," they formed, probably, only a harmless branch of that surpassing state, by which he was distinguished above all the neighbouring monarchs—and an outlet for some of that redundant wealth which had made, we are told, "silver and gold in Jerusalem as plenteous as stones." Indeed, the whole seems to have been connected with that lucrative "traffic," in which their settled condition, now for the first time permitted the Israelites to embark; and by which the nation was, under Solomon, so prodigiously enriched, and its fame extended to the most distant lands.

MARY. I am glad to see by our next chapter, that Solomon did not forget his father's injunctions, to "begin and build God's house." What immense numbers he must have "told out" to "bear burdens," and "hew stones"—when they required "three thousand six hundred overseers!"

MAMA. The "bearing of burdens," Mary. was then a most essential portion of the labour of every great undertaking; especially in a country like Judea, where horses were entirely confined to purposes of war, or state, and mechanical inventions had not yet superseded human exertions. Here, indeed, under such circumstances—the prodigious works of antiquity (far transcending modern undertakings) were achieved—would have ever remained a mystery, but for the scripture records of the immense population engaged in their accomplishment.

But whom did Solomon enlist as a powerful, and most necessary coadjutor, in his great enterprize?

MARY. "Huram, king of Tyre;" his father's old friend, I suppose, who had given David "cedars" for his own house already.

MAMA. And how clearly is the wisdom, as well as piety, of Solomon evinced, by the beautiful manner in which he sets forth to this foreign prince, the greatness of Hitn, for whom His own gracious encouragement alone, could have warranted the preparing a dwelling—and enumerates the sacred purposes to which the matchless building was to be devoted! Had the proud and civilized inhabitants of wealthy Tyre, think you—had all the philosophers and sages of pagan antiquity, even so much as conceived the idea of One only God, "whom the heaven of heavens could not contain?"

MARY. Oh! no. They worshipped a thousand, and thought every one lived in "houses made with hands," or in "groves," or in "hills."

MAMA. Do you recollect the peculiar "abomination of the Zidonians"—who, being closely connected with "Tyre" by habits and position, worshipped the same false deities?

MARY. I remember it, Mama, by your telling me, that Jezebel's father, the king of the "Zidonians," was called "Eth-Baal," after the national God.

MAMA. You see the use of these apparently trifling particulars being recorded and remembered.

MARY. But, Mama, I rather hope that Huram, (through David's means) knew and worshipped God; for he says, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel that made heaven and earth."

MAMA. Your charitable conjecture has been adopted by many—though, alas! such complimentary tributes to the deities of neighbouring nations were a frequent fruit of the toleration springing from polytheism.

But how did "Huram" (son, we find, to the king of the same name, who had made alliance with David) comply with the request of Solomon—so flattering to the superior skill and refinement of Tyrian artificers?

MARY. He sent him a man (who must have been half a Jew, for his mother was of the "tribe of Dan") who was skilful to work in gold, and silver, and brass, and iron; in stone and timber, and in purple . . . ."

MAMA. Stay, Mary; are you aware of any peculiarity in the last part of this enumeration?

MARY. Surely I have read somewhere about "Tyrian purple" as famous—what was it?

MAMA. A precious dye, long unpossessed by other nations—and the basis of which (though supposed to be a shell-fish peculiar to the Tyrian seas) is not yet precisely agreed on. Its rarity and costliness, (chiefly reserved for the royal robes of monarchs, which, to this day, continue to bear its colour)—explain its employment by the command of God, in the curtains of his holy tabernacle, and the garments of his anointed priests.

But were "dyed garments of Tyre," and artificers to prepare them, the only precious contribution, to be made by this "king of the isles," towards the building of the projected temple?

MARY. No, Mama. Cedars of Lebanon could be got nowhere else than from him, and his servants were "skilled to cut them." But why was Solomon obliged to supply them with food?

Mama. For this simple reason (which might have occurred even to you) that hosts of labourers on a craggy and precipitous mountain, covered with forests, could not be maintained but by supplies from other quarters. And as Tyre, powerful and wealthy as she was, occupied a barren "rock of the sea," (now, according to wonderful prophecy, used only by "fishers for drying their nets,")—the "corn, wine, and oil," in which Judea, we know, abounded, were naturally exchanged for Tyrian labour and skill.

How was the timber of these distant mountain forests, to reach Jerusalem?

MARY. In "floats by sea, to Joppa." What is a "float," Mama?

Mama. Another name for a "raft," Mary; a contrivance by which huge logs, rudely attached together, are "floated" down many of the great rivers of Europe and America, a distance sometimes of many hundred miles. If you had seen, as I have—these floating masses, on which houses, (inhabited for the months that the voyage lasts, by entire families) are erected—you would have had an idea, though a faint one perhaps, of the "floats," which wafted along the "coasts of Tyre and Sidon," to the sea-port of Joppa, the prostrate forests of Lebanon.

Whom did Solomon chiefly employ, in these laborious, and distant works?

MARY. The "strangers that were in the land of Israel." I suppose, Mama, some of the captive "Ammonites" that David took and made slaves of.

Mama. Very probably, as the "saws" and "axes" he has been gratuitously accused of employing on his prisoners, much more naturally point out the servile tasks to which they were subjected. The word "strangers" has also been supposed to include the descendants of the "mixed multitude," who, we know, accompanied the children of Israel into the promised land—and the proselyted remnant of the original possessors of Canaan; some of whom, (as we learn from the characters of "Araunah the Jebusite," and "Uriah the Hittite," were not unworthy to concur in the erection of a temple to the true and living God.

Let us now gather, from our next chapter, the precise site of this magnificent edifice. Where did Solomon "begin to build?" MARY. "At Jerusalem, in Mount Morial, where the Lord appeared unto David his father; in the thrashing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite."

MAMA. And was this the only angelic manifestation of the Divine presence, recorded of this celebrated mountain?

Many. Let me think, Mama! Abraham was told to get up and offer Isaac on a mountain God "would tell him of, in the land of Moriah." Was this the same?

Mama. It has always been so considered—as the sanctity, conferred upon it by the mysterious transaction, and the name of "Jehovah-jireh," (the Lord will provide) bestowed by Abraham, in commemoration of the substituted sacrifice—survived even the occupation of its site by the Canaanites—and no doubt formed a chief feature in the praiseworthy anxiety of David, to number this "mount of the Lord" among his earliest conquests, on coming to the throne. At all events, it was now solemnly consecrated, by the express command of Him, whose name it bore; and a "place," we find, had been thenceforth "prepared" there, by David, for the future temple.

Of the details of the building itself—though from the minutest of them, edification has been curiously deduced—we shall only notice the remarkable gradations of external magnificence (corresponding with those of internal sanctity) which distinguished the three grand portions into which the temple of Jerusalem was divided.

Does the mention of "Solomon's porch" recall any New Testament facts to your remembrance!

MARY. Yes; our Lord often "walked" there, especially in winter, and delivered discourses. so I suppose it was a public resort.

MAMA. Yes; it was there that great "multitures in together," on the miracle of healing the lame man, by John and Peter; and that the latter took occasion of the concourse, to preach Christ crucified.

But it is styled in the Acts, the "porch that was called Solomon's,"—was it really the one mentioned here?

MARY. I once thought so—till you explained about Solomon's beautiful temple being destroyed, and another built long after—not nearly so handsome. Mama—since Christ even was grieved that the one in his time should not have "a stone left on another,"—what must the first have been!

MAMA. Of the melancholy inferiority of the second, (noble as it was) we have an affecting proof, in the weeping, on its completion, of the "old men," who had seen the glories of its original prototype.

But besides the "porch," (scrupulously restored under the former name in the new edifice) and its outer court—common to all "strangers," not idolaters,—what are we to understand by the "greater house" here mentioned, as only "ceiled with fir-tree," though overlaid with pure gold?

MARY. Was not this where the priests might go every day, to minister; and where the "shew bread," and "altar of incense," and "golden candlestick" stood?

MAMA. Yes; the whole external symbols of God's visible worship.

But what place, more sacred still, where the "high priest" alone might enter, and that but "once a-year;"—was the magnificence and treasure of Solomon exhausted to adorn?

MARY. The "most holy house." Is not this called in the New Testament, the "Holy of holies?"

MAMA. It is; and as the earthly residence of the "mercy seat" of "Him that sitteth between the cherubim"—a type of the "heavenly places," into which our "great High Priest" has "once for all" ascended.

The "vail," then concealing this inner sanctuary from every human eye, has, (costly as it was) thanks to the same mighty agency, been long since "rent in twain." But one chief purpose of its description here, and of all the minute particulars handed down to us, of the awfully exclusive character of the Jewish worship and economy -should be to quicken our gratitude, that no "vail" now interposes between us and a reconciled God, save the gracious mildness under which his majesty is shrouded, in the human character and ministry of Christ; that the "daily sacrifice." for which such costly and dutiful provision was made by the pious king of Israel, has for ages been at dished by an "oblation" more pure and perfect far-that the "lavers" of purification, so essential under the Jewish dispensation, are superseded by our "robes" having been "made white in the blood of the Lamb,"-that the typical "candlestick," with its golden lamps, has long since been eclipsed by the diffusion of spiritual light from the "sun of righteousness"-and that the prostrate, though long venerable "altars" of Judea, are now "set up" in all their revived holiness-in every converted and sanctified hosom!

MORNING TWENTY-FIFTH.

LESSON,-1st Kings, Chapters viii. and ix.

MAMA. These chapters, my dear, which it is impossible, without extreme injury to their general effect, to disjoin—contain an account of the completion of the greatest work ever undertaken by an individual, and of the noblest recorded intercourse, between a favoured servant of the Most High, and the God he had "delighted to honour;" by the "obedience" which is "better than sacrifice," to his minutest, as well as greatest commands.

What formed the first necessary step towards the consecration of the now completed temple?

MARY. Assembling all "the men of Israel," that they might "bring up the ark of the covenant of the Lord out of the city of David, which is Zion."

Mana. The "assembly," my dear, was indeed general, including all the chief persons, and indeed the whole adult population of Judea. But were they, or any of them, competent to remove the ark to its new and permanent residence?

Mary. Oh! no; I did not mean that. The "priests and Levites" brought it, and all the other holy things.

MAMA. Do you find any thing striking and satisfactory in the enumeration?

MARY. It says the "tabernacle of the congagation" was brought too. Was this the one which Da ld made, or Moses' old one, from Gibeon?

MAMA. The phrase is one which would hardly have been applied to the mere temporary erection of David; and it is generally supposed, that the venerable and long exiled companion of the Israelites' wanderings in the wilderness, now shared in the "rest" prepared for the ark, by the piety of two successive monarchs.

But, Mary, in what awful, may (had it not been associated in their hearts and memories, with the most gracious recollections) almost appalling manner, did Jehovah testify the removal of the symbol of His presence, to the place he had "chosen, to put his name there?"

MARY. The "priests could not stand to minister, because of the cloud; for the glory of the Lord had filled the house of the Lord."

MAMA. And what merciful interposition was this double manifestation, of "thick darkness," on the one hand, and unbearable light on the other, calculated to recall?

MARY. The "pillar of cloud," you know, in the wilderness; and the fire that was in it, which lighted them always by night, and clarmed their enemies.

MAMA. And by which, (as we then remarked) the varying a peets and results of the blessed Gospel, to God's enemies and people, in more modern times, are clearly shadowed forth; to the one, "a savour of death" and condemnation—to the other, "light and life," and a guide to the heavenly Canaan above.

But the presence (by his well-known symbol) of Jehovah, having been duly recognized by Solomon, let us follow, with a portion at least of the holy fervour by which it was dictated—his sublime and, as a human composition, unequalled prayer. And to appreciate fully its impressive effect on the assembled thousands of Israel, we must borrow, (from the corresponding, but more diffuse account in the Chronieles) the circumstance of a "brazen scaffold" having been erected; on which the king, in the presence of all the people, spread forth his hands, and kneeling, addressed to God this memorable supplication, beginning at the 23d verse of our first chapter.

Read, and fix on your memory, its noble introductory paragraph. MARY. "Lord God of Israel, there is no God like thee in heaven above, or in the earth heavealt; who keepest covenant with thy servants that walk before thee with their whole heart."

MAMA. And mark the deep humble with which a young king, after a seven years' reion of naparalleled prosperity and glory, at the close of an undertaking unrivalled for extent and machideence-when (if ever) exultation might have been pardonable, and "beasting" not "ex 'nded,"refers all the success with which his labours had been crowned, to the piety and prayers of his father, and the promises and faithfulness of God. And how does he sublimely acknowledge (under the guidance of celestial wisdom, while all the surrounding nations indulged in the grossest conceptions of God,) that the universe itself scarce formed an adequate temple for the worship of Him, who had nevertheless condescended, in "very deed," to "dwell on earth!"

But, even from this grand and hambling conviction, let us beware of drawing, as some have unhappily done, conclusions unfavourable to the appointed and visible worship of that God, for whom (even while confessing his omnipresence) Solomon had felt it to be a duty to prepare a "house." To the futile remark of the despiser of ordinances, that God is everywhere, let us be prepared w reply, that it is where two or three are gathered in his name, that he has promised to vouchsafe his saving presence.

How does this prevailing sentiment manifest itself throughout the whole of Solomon's admirable prayer?

MARY. He prays, that God's "eyes would be open night and day towards his house," and, that he would "hear in heaven, his dwelling-place," the prayers his servants should make towards it. Does that not mean in it, Mama?

MAMA. It does, my dear; as in almost every instance, which occurs in the prayer, supplication is actually spoken of, as made within its walls; though, with a perverse inaccuracy very uncommon in our translators, the margin tells us they have substituted "in," at the only place where "towards" gives the true reading, viz. when Israel should be absent from God's house, and "smitten before their enemies."

But does your memory not supply you with a remarkable instance of successful prayer, made "tomards" even the site of this then ruined temple, by a persecuted but dauntless servant of God?

MARY. Oh! you mean Daniel, who opened his window, and prayed three times a-day "with his face towards Jerusalem."

MAMA. Yes, Mary; so literally, and we may judge from the miraculous deliverance which followed—a, ceptably were the words of Solomon's petition adhered to, by succeeding generations.

But what still more important lesson, might all who heard him draw from the cause, carefully assigned by him, for every affiletive visitation by which God might see fit to cleastise a forgetful people?

MAR: He always says it would by "because they had sinned," and that they must "confess and turn from their sins," before God would "hear in heaven, and forgive."

MAMA. Do you perceive in any part of this comprehensive model of devotion, a decided encouragement to individual prayer, even in seasons of national calamity?

MARY. I suppose you mean, when he says "what prayer or supplication shall be made by any man, which shall know every one the plague of his own heart;" and when he prays that God would give "every man according to his ways," for He only "knoweth the heart."

MAMA. Just so, Mary; a practical refutation of the common error, that national reformation can begin otherwise than by individual piety and penitence.

MARY. Mama! it is beautiful of Solomon to pray for the very "strangers" that should "hear of God!" It might have taught the Jews more charity towards them.

MAMA. Let it teach us, Mary, to extend that charity to those, who more unhappy, alas! have never (and possibly by our fault) yet "heard of His great name."

Do you remember how the affecting provision, here made for the people's possible future apostacy and captivity, by the prematurely wise young king, was, in after ages, verified?

MARY. I suppose Ezra, and Nehemiah and many others did "return with all their heart and soul to God, in the land of their enemies," and pray towards Jerusalem (like Daniel), else God would not have let them come back, and build the city and temple.

MAMA. Yes; but not merely did He thus; "incline their hearts to piety and penitence," but, in the very words of this inspired prayer, "He gave them compassion before those who carried them away captive."

Did Artaxerxes, Cyrus and other princes, by whom the "low estate" of the Jews was, by God's providence, at length viewed with commiscration—" send them away empty" to their long desolated land?

MARY. No. They gave them back many of their precious vessels for their temple; and ordered their heathen governors to be kind to, and help them. You told me this, when we were speaking about the Samaritans, and their "hindering" the Jews, and that making them hated afterwards.

MAMA. Well remembered. But on what grounds, Mary, more efficacious far than human penitence, or earthly monarch's compassion—does Solomon, in the conclusion of his inspired adcress, found his nation's claim on the forbearance, and forgiveness of God?

MARY. Their being "His people and his inheritance, whom he brought out of Egypt, from the midst of the furnace of iron," and "separated from among all the people of the earth."

MAMA. And shall Christians hesitate to adopt as their own, on yet more conclusive evidence, the same animating ground of confidence? Are they not God's "people" (in a manner unknown even to the chosen "seed of Abraham") whom He hath purchased unto Himself with the blood of his dear Son? And is not their separation (if indeed it have taken place) from the "evil that is in the world," a distinction more enviable and exhilarating far, than the temporary and exclusive "wall of partition," between Jew and Gentile of chd?

Let us, on the strength of these great and glorious privileges, accompany Solomon in the last and most important part of his petition, viz. that God would "incline our hearts to him, to walk in all his ways;" that he would "not leave, nor forsake us," but that the supplication thus made by, and for us, "may be nigh unto the Lord our God, day and night."

MARY. Mama! I cannot help wondering how "two and twenty thousand oxen" could be offered up at one time; or why so many were required. Surely God would know the greatness of Solomon's gratitude, without so many beasts being slain!

Mama. Two things are plain, Mary, from this hasty and inconsiderate remark of yours. First, you have not observed, that it was only on the cighth day that the innumerable multitude summoned by Solomon, were dismissed to their homes; and secondly, that the expenditure of animals you are tempted to consider wasteful, included all which were slaughtered during the time for the support of so many thousand people. If you had remembered that on an occasion of not greater (though possibly more general solemnity)—viz. the inauguration of David at Hebron) 340,000 Israelites had assembled around their king—any extent of provision which could be dedicated by princely munificence, to the double purpose—(always conjoined in the "peace-offerings" on joyful occasions)—of a tribute to Heaven, and a festal banquet for the assembled congregation—would not appear exaggerated.

The "burnt-offerings" (as I have before explained to you) or propitiatory sacrifice—had preceded the prayer of dedication; and consisted of "sneep and oxen that could not be numbered for multitude," freely given, according it their ability, by both monarch and people. But in the subsequent account of the festal sacrifices, the "fat" only, of the "peace-offerings," is distinctly mentioned as consumed on the altar; and to such an extent did even this amount, that the middle space of the court was expressly "hallowed" for its reception.

MARY. I understand now, Mama; and so I should have done before. But I don't quite know why the people are said to have been sent away on the eighth day, and yet the feast to have lasted "fourteen?"

MAMA. It has been calculated, that two great feasts of the Jews, each containing seven days, were at this time held together; viz. the new one called henceforward the "dedication;" and that of Tabernacles, whose actual period had arrived. And it was on the "eighth" of this latter feast (which terminated the period of "fourteen)" that the people, blessing and blessed by their monarch, joyfully returned to their homes.

But we must hasten to the gracious answer which it pleased the God of heaven and earth to make to the "prayer and supplication," so devoutly addressed to Him by Solomon. What was its tenor?

MARY. God appeared to him a second time, and said that He had "hallowed the house he had built, to put his name there for ever,"—and that "His eyes and His heart should be there perpetually."

MAMA. Magnificent promises, Mary; coming from Him who, as Solomon truly said, "keepeth covenant and mercy with his servants that walk before him with all their heart." But was this condition at all lost sight of, in the reply of Him, with whom "there is no variableness?"

MARY. No, Mama. If they "turned from following God," and would not keep his commandments, and went after other gods to worship them—He was to "cut off Israel out of the land." And Israel should be a "proverb and a by-word" among all people—and every one that passed "that house which was so high, should be astonished and hiss, and say, "why hath the Lord God done this unto this land, and this house?"

Mama—this came frightfully true! Josephus says the very Romans thought the Jews must have provoked their gods beyond measure—to be so horribly punished.

MAMA. Alas! Mary! we need not go so far for examples, of sin and punishment, as the degenerate Jews of our Lord's time, or the infatuated multitudes who perished (to avenge his death) by heathen hands, or the polluted floor of his very temple. Solomon—the pious enlightened bolomon—the author of the finest prayer ever uttered by the lips of man—lived to be himself an idolater! and to be, by the predicted dismemberment of his son's kingdem—the first example of retributive justice under the covenant he had broken!

Our difficulty in conceiving this, and similar outrageous departures from known duty in others—only proves our very limited knowledge of ourselves; and had such not been recorded, of even eminent Scripture characters, it is doubtful whether the extent of human depravity would ever have flashed wholesome but painful conviction on the reluctant mind of man.

Of this reluctance I am myself a proof, in the willingness with which I would have closed the record of the life of Solomon, with the edifying scene, in which we have seen him take so exalted a part.

But the great moral lesson afforded, by the apostacy and defection—(at the suggestion of heathen wives) of him whom, in this chapter, we find too scrupulous, to permit his proselyted Egyptian queen to reside within the precincts of the holy city—is recorded for the "reproof and conviction" of generations unborn; and is one of the many inspired comments on that most frequently forgotten, and therefore most necessary of Scripture admonitions—" Be not high-minded, but fear."

MORNING TWENTY-SIXTH.

LESSON .- 1st Flures, Chapters x. and xi.

MARY. Mama; I am quite sorry, like you, that we could not end the history of Solomon, with his dedication of the temple. For though it is pleasant to hear of his greatness, and of the Queen of Sheba coming so far to admire his wisdom—it is all spoiled by his forsaking God, and worshipping idols.

MAMA. That he ever absolutely forsook and renounced the God of his father, the "God of heaven and earth," whom he had invoked in the presence of assembled thousands—and proclaimed to the distant "Kings of Tyre and the Isles"—seems an extent of folly and wickedness, inconsistent with even the temporal forbearance exercised towards him by that God, for the sake of his "oath to David." But the toleration, and countenance, afforded by one so apparently "rooted and grounded in the faith" of Jehovah—to the impure rites of his heathen wives, and their adoption into revolting conjunction, with the service of Him, in whose sight the heavens are not clean, and who chargeth His angels with folly"—amply justifies, to every mind, the "rending away" from the now apostate line of David, of the bulk of their profaned, and forfeited kingdom.

But before advancing to the melancholy conclusion of a life, which he who had thus misused it, might well pronounce to be "vanity and vexation"—we must go back to gather, were it only for the purpose of salutary contrast-from the last three verses of the former chapter, some indication of the sources and amount of the excessive wealth by which the heart of Solomon seems to have been, at length, corrupted, and "turned aside." Indeed the riches here enumerated, were more than indirectly, a "snare" to their possessor; since of that pomp and magnificence, for which they afforded the means, the multiplicity of "strange women" by whom his heart was fatally alienated-formed a customary eastern branch-wives (many of whom never beheld their nominal master) being there "multiplied" by great people, like horses, elephants, or other animals kept for parade and state.

MARY. Mama, where was "Ophir," from which Solomon's ships brought all that quantity of gold? Is it any place known now?

MAMA. Its precise situation Mary, has occupied more pages than we can afford to bestow on it words. It has naturally excited the curiosity of the learned, and the cupidity of the merchant; and some have supposed the Island of Socotra on the coast of Africa, and others that of Ceylon, on the shores of India, to have been the "Ophir" of the Bible. But among the many lights which have been thrown on Scripture geography by modern travels-those of Bruce especially, in the little known regions of Africa-may be included the idea, (sanctioned by the most eminent modern geographers) that to reach the wealthy "Ophir" the ships had only to proceed along the northern and western shores of Africa, as far as the region still retaining the significant name of the "gold coast"-a voyage much more adapted to the infant state of navigation, than crossing the ocean to the distant shores of India. The length of time occupied, viz. three years-has been satisfactorily accounted for by the great difficulties presented to unskilful navigators, by the currents and monsoons of the intervening seas; and though no point of doctrine or inference of consequence is happily involved in the discussion-the clucidation of Scripture localities must ever be an interesting adjunct to more important inquiries.

"Eloth," and "Ezion-Geber" to which we are told in the corresponding part of Chronicles, Solomon went in person, to establish, conjointly with the more experienced merchants of Tyre—this lucrative traffic—were cities on the Red Sea, which had been conquered by his father from Edom; when that whole country (in a passage we have accidentally left out) was subdued by David, and his general Joab.

How remarkably Mary, do all these successive conquests, achieved by the armies of the God of Israel-verify the prediction uttered by the Psalmist-while yet himself an outcast and fugitiveas to the final extinction as kingdoms, of the rebel states of "Edom" and "Philistia;" of which last, after his repeated victories, we hear little more in Scripture. Of the more pacific parts of the same prophecy, as to the "gifts" of the "Kings of the Isles," we have had a literal fulfilment, not only in the supplies furnished by "Huram" for the building of the temple-but a voluntary present of "six score talents of gold." And we are now to trace, in the celebrated personal visit of the Queen of Sheba,-not only a striking general coincidence with the glowing language of the 72d Psalm-but a literal accomplishment of its minute and remarkable expression —" One shall bring him of the gold of Sheba"—indicating that some individual, of sufficient eminence to be thus designated—should be the bearer of the homage.

In whose person do we find this fulfilled?

MARY. The "Queen of Sheba" of course—where was her kingdom!

MAMA. This is as little agreed on, my dear, as the site of "Ophir." Josephus, and the Jews generally say it was in Africa, and the modern Abyssinians, by claiming her as their sovereign, countenance the traditionary belief. But the more general opinion of the learned is in favour of Arabia—a country famous for "spices" as well as for the "camels" by which they were borne—a conjecture which agrees with the epithet bestowed on her by our Lord, of "Queen of the South."

Do you remember for what she is placed by him in advantageous contrast with the "generation" whom he addressed?

MARY. Because she "came from the uttermost ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon"—and they would not hearken to a "greater" who was "here" among them.

MAMA. Let us beware, Mary, lest we share their condemnation; and while seeking to draw instruction from events and characters the most remote—overlook, or misuse opportunities of edification arising in our own daily history and path.

But what part of the fame of Solomon was it, that attracted this distant princess, and gained for her the commendation of our Saviour?

Many. It was "concerning the name of the Lord," that she came to "prove him with hard questions," and "communed with him of all that was in her heart."

Mama. If there be any truth in the former, and national tradition, which places the site of her reign in remote Africa—and ascribes to her the conversion of her Abyssinian subjects—how strikingly is here verified the Psalmist's prediction, of "Ethiopia shall yet stretch out her hands unto God!" Or, if we adopt the other opinion, of her being an Arabian princess, descended from Abraham by his wife Keturah, (by whose son, named "Sheba," the country was first peopled,) how pleasing is it to trace, in one even remotely sprung from the family of the "friend of God"—a desire to be better instructed in the patriarchal faith, of which some faint tradition might have been there preserved!

Be this as it may—she was not disappointed in her pursuit of the wisdom, for which she freely bartered the most precious products of her realm, and which—like him from whom she came to imbibe it—she justly considered to be more "precious than rubies, and the gain thereof than fine gold." In what terms does she express this conviction, in her parting address to Solomon?

MARY. "Happy are these men, thy servants, which stand continually before thee and hear thy wisdom!"

"Blessed be the Lord thy God, which delighted in thee to set thee on the throne of Israel—therefore he made thee king, to do judgment and justice." Mama; this puts me in mind of the picture in your great Bible, called the "judgment of Solomon." I used to be half afraid to look at it when a child; because I thought the little baby in the picture was to be cut in two. When did the thing happen?

MAMA. Our transition (for more important objects) at once from the book of Samuel to that of Chronicles, and consequent omission of the carlier and corresponding chapters of Kings—made us overlook this singular domestic incident; which is recorded as having taken place immediately after the gift of wisdom from above, was conferred on Solomon.

Do you remember the particulars of the story?

MARY. Oh! yes; they were too strange to be forgot. Two women living in one house, quarrelled about whose child had been overlaid; and as both wanted the living one, and nobody could tell whose it really was, Solomon pretended to order it to be divided between them. But the real mother begged him for God's sake to do no such thing; as she would rather go without it than see it murdered before her eyes.

MAMA. Exactly. I see you are mistress, in your own way, of the leading circumstances of this singular decision, so creditable to the discernment of Solomon. I will tell you in return, a little Jewish legend (of the many preserved in their "traditions" about the same monarch); in which, if true, (which I am far from asserting)—somewhat of the same acuteness was manifested.

The Queen of Sheba, it is said, among other "hard questions" of a more solemn and dignified cast, with which she "proved" Solomon, defied him, at the farewell banquet, given by him on her departure—to distinguish between two garlands, one of natural, the other of fictitious flowers—woven by her attendant damsels. The eye of the monarch was completely baffled by the resemblance; but his characteristic sagacity only shone the more conspicuous. He ordered the lattices of the hall, on pretence of heat—to be opened; and the bees thus admitted from the adjacent gardens—at once detected the imposture, by settling exclusively on their natural food.

MARY. Thank you, Mama. I did not think artificial flowers had been as old as Solomon; and I shall never see any now without thinking of this pretty story.

But no wonder the queen went away astonished at Solomon's magnificence, as well as his wisdom! It quite dazzles one only to read of it.

MAMA. Yes, Mary; were not all this wealth attended with the depressing consciousness, (before alluded to) that to its unwholesome and corrupting influx and effects—Solomon ultimately owed the loss of God's favour to himself, and of the kingdom to his posterity. To "exceed all the kings of the earth for riches and wisdom"—is indeed to be placed on a perilous eminence! And if even the judgment and integrity of a Solomon, proved unequal to sustain him on it—how little can human elevation be an object of legitimate envy or desire!

We must now come to the immediate cause of this melancholy declension—not only that excessive monopoly of wives by an individual, by which the wonderful equality in numbers between the two sexes, established by Providence for ensuring the primitive institution of marriage, is often in eastern countries "made of none effect"—but the selection of them by Solomon from among those Canaanite idolaters, with whom it had been expressly forbidden the Israelites to form connexions—and of whom they had been emphatically warned, that they would "surely turn away their heart after their gods."

MARY. That they did, Mama! One can scarcely believe it is Solomon, who could "go after" "Astaroth," and "Milcom," and "Chemosh," and all the other "abominations"—and even build high places for them, opposite the very temple of Jcrusalem!

MAMA. Ay, Mary; and on what "hill' think you, were these iniquitous shrines erected? Even on that "Mount of Olives," where a "greater than Solomon" contemplated Jerusalem, and wept over yet uncommitted sins, more "scarlet" still in their dye, than the apostacies of the now no longer idolatrous Jews!

But do you remember the peculiarly offensive character in the eyes of the Lord, of "Moloch"—the idol whose temple crowned the summit of Mount Olivet;—or the odious nature of the rites, for which the adjacent valley of "Tophet," or "Hinnom"—was devoted to utter desolation by an indignant God?

MARY. Was not that the idol the Jews

"made their children pass through the fire" to, or burnt them alive, as you told me they did in that place long after?

MAMA. The same, Mary; and if the "sacrifices," by which the wives of the infatuated old king propitiated these monsters, were at all akin to those described by the prophets—no wonder the outraged Majesty of heaven and earth was "angry with Solomon!"

MARY. It was much more wonderful, I think, ant God did not strike him dead immediately, instead of sparing his life, and leaving him the kingdom all his days, for his father's sake.

MAMA. It is the nature of the Divine mercy and forbearance, Mary, always to transcend our finite comprehension. And if we may trust to the deeply affecting warnings scattered throughout the later writings of Solomon, respecting the mischiefs attendant on unhallowed connexionssuch as "the mouth of strange women is a deep pit; he that is abhorred of the Lord shall fall therein;"-and, "I find more bitter than death the woman whose heart is snares and nets, and her hands as bands: whoso pleaseth God shall escape from her, but he that sinneth shall be taken by her;"-and subjoin to this hard-wrung testimony of a convicted conscience. "He that covereth his sins shall not prosper, but whose confesseth and forsaketh them shall have mercy,"-it may be in our power to hope, with some, that penitence akin to his illustrious father's, averted from his own head the penal consequences of guilt. But, like his father's, it was not destined to go unpunished; for, from this time forth, his before prosperous and pacific reign is disturbed by continual and harassing insurrections.

Passing over the earlier of these, under "Hadad" and "Rezon," and the galling circumstance of the former being harboured and encouraged under the roof of Solomon's own Egyptian father-in-law—what feature did you observe in the denunciation of the God whom he had offended, calculated to make the "rending away" of his hereditary kingdom more grievous and painful?

MARY. It was to be given to his "servant." That meant "Jereboam," did it not? I see here all about Ahijah promising him ten tribes; and you know we referred to it long ago, when you first began to explain the Bible to me.

MAMA. Yes, Mary, we have now reached, (after many interesting, and I trust not wholly unprofitable, conversations) the point of Scripture at which we originally set out; though my random selection for our first readings, of an isolated portion of holy writ, has obliged us sometimes to retrace our steps, in an awkward manner, which I have often since regretted.

I am not sure, however, that though chronological order and convenience would have dictated (had I foreseen their extent) a different arrangement of our joint studies—the important end of the gradual unfolding of scriptural truth, would have been materially advanced by a more regular course of proceeding.

The Book of . "Kings," with which we accidentally commenced, contains much of lively narration, attractive to the taste, and adapted to the comprehension of childhood; and was there-Fire well calculated to awaken the interest which it was my chief object to excite. Your own choice and wishes next led us to explore the wanderings of the children of Israel in the wilderness; and the "wondrous things out of God's law," which were thus "made to pass before us," -not only admitted of, but required that deeper and more spiritual application, of which advancing age had made you capable. The Books of "Joshua" and "Judges," again, by their chequered and narrative character, and occasional obscurities, served to exercise the awakened spirit of enquiry, which habit and experience had fostered; and to pave the way for the satisfactory, and I trust not delusive evidence of a maturer judgment in spiritual things, manifested during our joint investigation of the historics of David and Solomon. With these, we shall now bid adieu to the Old Testament; and if life and leisure are granted, turn to the perusal of the blessed pages of the New, with all the advantages for their study, afforded by increased acquaintance with the preparatory dispensation by which they were ushered in.

That any Christian, as too many do, should habitually neglect and undervalue that portion of Holy Writ, out of whose "good treasure" our Lord himself disdained not perpetually to bring forth for the edification of his hearers, "things new and old"—("old" in their venerable authority—"new" in his exquisite adaptation of them to passing events and circumstances)—has always seemed to me voluntarily to forego an inestimable source, both of instruction and pleasure. Nor can, indeed, most parts of the New Testament, the epistles especially, be even intelligible, without intimate familiarity with the Jewish Scriptures.

To these epistles, the easier at least among them, I hope, ere long, to direct your attention; when a review—as detailed at least, as we have bestowed on the biographies of mere human beings—shall have heightened our reverence and deepened our love, for the perfect character of that "Lord," who, to borrow the expressive phrase of Solomon—" in rery deed dwelt among men."

In the meantime, I know not that we can more impressively or appropriately close our present course of study, than by adopting as its termination, the beautiful words of "Ecclesiastes," in which Solomon, under the title of the " Preacher"--(one which he had lived to consider more honourable than that of the mightiest monarch) records his solemn protest against all the "vanity of vanities" which he had "found under the sun;" exhorts to that "remembering of the Creator : the days of youth," which he had before declared to be the "beginning of wisdom;" describes with a force of imagery, which has been the admiration of successive ages, the "loosing of the silver cord," and breaking of the golden bowl at the fountain," indicative of the final decay of that curious but perishable fabric, the earthly tabernacle of our race; and after summing up in "fearing God and keeping the commandments," the "whole duty of man"-leaves to those, who, like himself, may have been seduced from the paths of godliness,-the awful admonition, that "God will bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil."

all the wicked kings that had hid themselves in a cave" for fear of him.

MAMA. Stop, Mary. I could not help being struck with a coincidence. Are there any future enemies of God and His Christ, of whose conduct and extastrophe this incident may profitably remind you? Of what greater conqueror did we say Joshua was a type?

MARY. Of our Saviour, Mama, and I know now whom you mean; you are thinking of the last Jay, and the wicked calling on the "rocks to cover them from the face of the Lord and the wrath of the Lamb."

MAMA. You are quite right. Mary; and with as little success, alas! will they seek that fruitless refuge, as the kings mentioned here, did the unavailing shelter of the cave of Makkedah! Fanciful interpreters of Scripture might even pursue the parallel, and see in the stern though whole-me severity of Joshua, by which the feet of his captains were placed on the necks of these proud "defiers of the Lord," a foretaste of the future humiliation of His enemies, and the exaltation of those "saints" over whom, for a season, they may have been permitted to triumph.

Did this signal chastisement move to submison any of the remaining Canaanite nations? an' in the very next chapter we have another league of wicked kings against fsrael, just as if nothing had happened.

MAMA. And nothing can happen which, to those whom God has judicially abandoned to a reprobate mind, will prove a sufficient or seasonable warning.

MARY. But, though it says here "it was of the Lord to harden their hearts that they should come against Israel in battle, that He might destroy them utterly," you explained to me before (about Pharaoh) that God hardened nobody, only left them to themselves, when incorrigibly wicked-

MAMA. And what does the verse go on to infer might have been the result of a different conduct; of humbly suing for peace, like the inhabitants of Gibeon, instead of "coming against Israel in battle?"

MARY. Oh! they might perhaps have "found favour." That seems to say if even Canaanites could have repented, God had not quite shut the door of mercy on them. But we hear of none that did, Mama, and yet there were Canaanites, you put me in mind, living in Judea in our Lord's time.

MAMA. Yes, Mary; in consequence of that very different and unsanctified spirit of toleration by which the Israelites were prompted, not only to spare the lives of God's impenitent enemies, b to make with them unhallowed alliances, to imitate their idolatries, and adopt their vices.

It is the best answer to the favourite remark of scoffers, on the supposed ferocity with which the execution of God's decrees must have inspired the brachtes, that in every possible case these unwilling executioners were but too ready to frustrate or evade their wholesome severity; while to those disposed to question its necessity, a standing reply has been furnished in the greedy adoption, by these too lenient conquerors, of every error and enormity for which God had commissioned them to sweep the Canaanites from the contaminated earth.

As a proof of this, we have only to remember that it was, in after ages, the worship of that very "Queen of heaven" (or the moon), the favourite goddess of the Canaanites, which chiefly moved God to lead into captivity the descendants of those very Jews; whom at His command, we have seen the false deity of Canaan compelled to assist, by her "handmaid" light, in the slaughter of her own deluded votaries.

MARY. I am quite satisfied now, Mama, that it was right to cut off those wicked people, but it seems cruel to hurt the poor horses. Why were they to be lamed by the Israelites?

MAMA. Simply because no less decisive measure would have prevented that proud and stiffnecked people from placing then (as they afterwards did) all their confidence "in chariots and horses, and not in the Lord of Hosts." It is thought, too, that in the prohibition to "multiply horses," God had the further merciful view of preserving, for the maintenance of the "many thousands of Israel," that large portion of the produce of a limited territory which, in later times (under their ostentations kings), was usurped by their innumerable establishments of horses. I am glad to call your attention to these particulars, to shew you, (thanks to the learned men who have patiently investigated the subject,) the foundation not only in Divine authority, but even in worldly wisdom, of many of the most apparently insignificant and arbitrary precepts of the Mosaic dispensation. could appear more natural or immaterial than that the conquerors of Canaan should keep alive and appropriate the horses of their enemies. But if (as we know was the case) by so doing, they either encroached unduly on human subsistence in a thickly peopled country, or, what was far worse, came to substitute "trust in chariots and horses," for confidence in an Almighty defender, even our finite understandings can be made at once to pererive the propriety of the sacrifice. If not a sparrow falls to the ground without the permission our Heavenly Father, sure we are, or may be, that the slaughter of a whole host of unoffending animals was not enjoined or permitted but for wise and sufficient reasons.

Let us treasure up and apply the example, when a prohibition, at first as little understood by us, comes athwart our own wayward tastes and inclinations; and acquiesce in this, as in greater matters, in the arrangements of Him who alone knows "what is good for man all the days of his wall life, which he spendeth as a shadow."

MORNING SIXTH.

Lesson,—Joshua Chapter xvii. to verse 10th; Chapter xxi. from verse 41st to the end; Chapter xxii.

MARY. We have left out some chapters, I see, Mama: they seem full of nothing but names of places, and, for that reason, I suppose, you have made me pass them over.

MAMA. Yes, Mary; because I thought our time might be more profitably employed, than in the mere enumeration of the districts assigned by Joshna to the various tribes of the children of Israel. Yet, as we learn that this division took place (though by lot) under the immediate sangtion and superintendence of God, it will furnish us with a wonderful corroboration of the prophetic spirit imparted by Him to his servants Jacob and Moses, to compare (on the authority of learned men) the exact conformity between the actual inheritance of each of the twelve tribes, and that predicted to them by the dying patriarchs. Look back and see what is said at the xlix, chapter. 4 Genesis verse 11th, of the lot of the tribe of Judah.

MARY. "Binding his fole unto the vine, and his ass's colt unto the choice vine; he washed his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes. His eyes shall be red with wine, and his teeth white with milk."

MAMA. And how was this strictly fulfilled? By the assignment to the tribe of Judah of a cuntry renowned for the excellence of its vines and pasture grounds. Go on, before quitting the prophecy of Jacob, and see what it says of Zebulon and Asher.

MARY. "Zebulon shall dwell at the haven of the sea, and he shall be for an haven of ships."

MAMA. And so it was, Mary; a country abounding in sea-ports, having fallen to the lot of this tribe; of which Moses also, in his dying benediction, says, it shall "suck of the abundance of the seas." Is there any thing remarkable in Jacob's description of the portion of Asher?

MARY. "Out of Asher his bread shall be fut, he shall yield royal dainties."

MAMA. Which Moses corroborates by this strong expression, "he shall dip his foot in oil." Could any thing more decisively indicate a district, fertile, we are told, beyond others, in the ruit of the olive? But, not satisfied with this coincidence, Moses adds of Asher, "thy shoes shall be iron and brass;" both of which productions ancient geographers prove to have abounded in the rich inheritance of Asher.

The comparison, were it necessary, might be pursued through nearly all the separate allotments of which any particulars have come down to us. But we will content ourselves with the most remarkable, because least likely to have a natural fulfilment. What portion did the dying Jacob assign to his two sons, Simeon and Levi?

MARY. None, Mama; how strange! He seems too angry to promise them any thing.

MAMA. Yes; for their cruelty to the Shechemites. And what was the fate predicted alike to both by their incensed parent, at verse 7th?

MARY. " I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel." Did this happen to both?

MAMA. Yes, but in a sense so widely different, that none but He who overrules the expressions of his inspired servants could have ensured its fulfilment by means so opposite. The tribe of Simeon never had a distinct territory allotted to it, but was desired to take possession of the redundant space which partiality had at first assigned to Judah; while the Levites (as we are about to see) were dispersed by the express command of God, as mere "sojourners" amid the other tribes, as the tenants of His bounty and ministers of His religion. Do you remember how the Levites had prevailed to procure for themselves this "blessing" instead of the "curse" pronounced on them by Jacob; under which Simeon was permitted to remain a dispersed and "scattered" tribe?

MARY. Was it because Moses and Aaron were "sous of Levi," and all their children priests?

MAMA. Not all their children surely, Mary; neither Moses nor his descerdants had any claim to the priesthood, which remained in the single family of Aaron. It was, on the contrary, by their decided opposition to the sin of Aaron,—by their holy immolation of the offenders in the matter of the golden calf, that the tribe of Levi earned the blessing of the Most High, and the privilege of being to their remotest posterity the special people of the Lord; dispersed as the "salt of the earth" among their brethren, who were enjoined to cherish and entertain them "in all their dwellings," as they valued the favour of their God.

We are now brought by this, I hope not unprofitable review of the substance of the chapters omitted, to the immediate subject of our present reading. What do we learn from the twenty-first chapter?

 MARY. The allotment of 48 cities and their burbs for the Levites to live in; all over Israel; instead of a country to themselves, as the rest of the tribes had.

MAMA. To you and me, Mary, it would naturally appear that they were scattered to live "all over Israel," as you call it. But wiser people have remarked that the greater part of the cities thus set apart for the hallowed residence (of the priests especially), lay in the portion of territory nearest to, and surrounding Jerusalem—that which in after times comprised the favoured kingdom of Judah; thus securing to the two faithful tribes an abundant supply of ministers, and preserving the peculiar servants of God from the alternative of either sharing the idolatry of Jeroboam, or being despoiled by that wicked tyrant of their lawful possessions. But that even he might not be left "without a witness," to testify against him and his rebellion; abundance of faithful teachers remained in Israel to render inexcusable his taking upon him to make "priests,"-a light thing indeed in one who has already set up an impious manufacture of gods!

The Levites being thus installed without a blow in their peaceful inheritance, the same blessing seems to have rested for a time on all the other tribes. With what happy, and to them most unworted, state of things, does the first chapt conclude? MARY. "And the Lord gave unto them rest round about; according to all that he sware unto their fathers. And there stood not a man of all their enemies before them,—the Lord destroyed all their enemies unto their hand. There failed not ought of any good thing which the Lord had spoken unto the house of Israel; all came to pass."

Mama. And thus, let us ever remember, would they have continued to be preserved and supported, had they, on their part, observed the simple, and apparently easy conditions, of fearing and serving the Lord. But what portion of these tribes does the twenty-second chapter represent Joshua as specially exhorting to this course of faith and obedience?

MARY. The Reubenites, and Gadites, and half tribe of Manasseh.

MAMA. And what made their adherence to duty and the worship of Jehovah especially precarious?

MARY. Because they lived on the other side of Jordan, far from Shiloh, and surrounded by heathens.

MAMA. Right. Then for what reason had the fighting men among them hitherto accompanied their brethren?

MARY. Oh! you remember Moses told them would be a shame, now that they were comfortably settled, if they did not help the other tribes to conquer their inheritance.

MAMA. I am glad you recollected this; and I shall rejoice still more, if, in the spirit of this truly fraternal conduct, you, my dear child, think it " would be a shame" not to contribute, by every means in your power, to introduce your ignorant heathen brethren to a participation of that far richer "inheritance of the saints in light," with which a merit not your own has already invested you! Seven long years, it is said, the Reubenites and Gadites had abandoned their flocks and herds, and lands and families, beyond Jordan, to fight the battles of the Lord and their brethren, against idolatry and wickedness. You admire and approve them. Never forget that there are, in our days, men, who forego, and for life, all the comforts of home, and country, and friends, to plant the banners of the same Lord on the strongholds of paganism; and let your prayers at least, if your age forbids more, go along with and assist them.

With what emphatic blessing did Joshua send away these friendly warriors, to their own tents and possessions  $\dot{\gamma}$

MARY. "Return with much riches to your tents, and with very much cattle, with silver and with gold."

MAMA. I fear, Mary, you are overlooking, in the temporal reward of their fidelity, the more important condition of these continued blessings. What says verse 5th?

MARY. "But take diligent heed to do the commandment and the law, which Moses the servant of the Lord charged you, to love the Lord your God, and to walk in all his ways, and to keep his commandments, and to cleave unto him, are to zerve him with all your heart and with all your soul."

MAMA. Yes, Mary, "so" it is said, and truly, "Joshua blessed them,"—and well had it been for them had the injunction been duly remembered! But how, in the mean time, did they seek to provide against its being forgotten?

MARY. "They built an altar by Jordan, a great altar." Mama, I don't wonder the other tribes were angry; it was just like Jeroboam whom we spoke of just now.

MAMA. Nay, Mary, you run away with it: for not only did they set up no "golden calves" or other idols, in competition with Jehovah,—but the altar was not even intended for sacrifice to Him. It was simply (as the verse you quoted has it) an altar to "see to"—a mere memorial of their devotion to, and acknowledgment of, the true God, notwithstanding their estrangement by distance from his sanctuary.

That Israel should have feared otherwise was by no means unnatural, though "going to war" on the subject, without inquiry, with those who had so lately been their own faithful allies, would have been equally rash and unjustifiable. They took a better method-that of a friendly embassy; and I know of few facts in Holy Writ more impressive, or more creditable to the Jewish nation, than this assertion of God's sole honour by Israel, on the one hand, and manly vindication of the motives of the seven tribes on the other. Well would it be for the world, Mary, and for the cause of religion, were all questions relating to it discussed among "brethren" in the same uncompromising, yet conciliatory spirit! Did you remark, in proof of both, that the Israelites even offer, if the exiled tribes thought themselves cut off, by their position, from spiritual privileges, to give them up part of their own possessions in the promised land, rather than that, by a rival altar, God should be robbed of his glory?

MARY. I did not observe it, but I am sorry I was so hasty against the poor Reubenites and Gadites; for really so far from being wrong, they were quite right to make a "pattern" altar tookeep their children in mind of God.

MAMA. Yes, and to put it out of the power of future generations to style their progeny "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, without hope and without God in the world."

What effect had the manly and convincing explanation of the accused tribes on their countrymen?

MARY. They told them, that, by "not committing this trespass against the Lord, they had dell ored the children of Israel out of the hand of the Lord." How could this be, Mama?

MAMA. By averting those temporal judgments, which would not, under that dispensation, have failed to follow the apostasy of even a portion of God's chosen people. But for what uncommitted "trespass" on their own parts did these wise and good men specially bless God?

Mary. "That they had not gone up in battle to destroy the land wherein the children of Reuben and of Gad dwelt."

Mama. Let this be a lesson to you, Mary, against rash judgments, to which you, even in the same matter, shewed yourself a little prone. There are few instances of apparent wrong, (between man and man especially), which dispassionate investigation will not either soften or renewove: and even in supposed offences against God, becomes those who see not the heart, to refer

"judgment" at least, if not disapprobation, to Him to whom its impost recesses are known.

By what significant name was the Altar of Memorial called, by its pious founders?

MARY. "They called the altar Ed."

Mama. That is a "witness;" and the testimony they designed it to bear, was not to the existence of God, (as the translation might lead us to suppose), but to his being the God of themselves and their expatriated children. Would, Mary, that every exile among ourselves, from his country and its altars, were careful to set up in his heart and life such a living memorial of the faith of his native land, as heathens might admire, and not even an infidel could question or gainsay!

MORNING SEVENTIL

Lesson.-Joshua, Chapters xxiii and xxiv.

Mama. We have in these chapters a fresh and affecting instance of the uniform solicitude of all the true servants of God, whom Scripture exhibits to us in situations of eminent trust and authority, to bequeath, ere they go hence and are no more seen, to their people and families, the invaluable legacy of a recital of God's past mercies, and a recapitulation of His promises and His commands. And surely if there is a time when such praiseworthy endeavours are likely to be blessed with success, it is when those who have, throughout long lives of picty and usefulness, displayed an example of the conduct they inculcate, can triumphantly appeal to their surrounding descendants for the truth of the testimony they deliver; while it is to hearts softened by the approaching "death of the righteous," that the opeal is affectionately addressed!

But whose immediate example was in this, as in many other parts of his public life, expressly tollowed by Joshua?

MARY. That of Moses, Mama. You know we read in Deuteronomy, his beautiful dying speech to the children of Israel; and I don't think they were ever quite so bad since they heard it.

MAMA. I agree with you that we scarcely hear of such flagrant offences as making the "golden calf," or the revolt of Korah and his companions, during the administration of Joshua. But then the period, remember, had not been (like that in the wilderness,) one of trial and vicissitude, but of nearly continual success, and Divine encouragement. It was absence of temptation to murmur and disobey, which, I fear, had more weight with Israel than the dying injunctions of Moses, though these could not yet have been forgotten. At what period were they renewed by Joshua?

MARY. "A long time after the Lord had given rest unto Israel from all their enemies." How long, Mama?

MAMA. It is supposed about seventeen years; during which, Joshua, their faithful leader, by building a city on his own allotment, had provided for the security of his immediate descendants. What is then said of the bodily condition of this upright servant of the Lord?

Many. That "he waxed old and stricken age." How old, Mama? Did he live to be as old as Moses and Aaron?

MAMA. As he was a man of known weight and judgment when sent into Canaan with the other spies, and as we know that, for their fault, he was doomed to wander forty years in the wilderness, (though with the favour and promises of God to cheer him during their continuance) he was prebably eighty at least on entering Canaan, about two years from which had now elapsed; so that less than one hundred cannot well be assigned as the "ripe age" at which (like a shock of corn in his season) the valiant type of a greater conqueror was peacefully gathered to his fathers.

MARY. Mama! what became of Caleb? You know he and Joshua were the only two who were to enter Canaan.

MAMA. I am glad you thought of asking; as the history of his comfortable settlement in it—that sure word of God, not "one jot or tittle" of which can ever fail—occurred in a chapter, which, on that very account, I intended to have made you read. Not only did that good soldier of the Lord of hosts safely reach the land of promise, but strong (as he himself says) at the age of eighty-five, as when Moses first sent him forth to "search" it—he boldly claims, on the authority of is promise in the name of God—the very mountain on which his feet had trodden when (unlike their false and timid brethren) he and Joshua "wholly followed the Lord."

MARY. What mountain, Mama?

MAMA. That of Hebron, long after sacred to the Lord, and, before the conquest of Jerusalem, the residence of His servant David. The request proves the yet undamnted character of the aged warrior; for Hebron, at the time it was made, was the stronghold of those very "Anakims" (or Giants) before whom the other spies basely trembled, but whom Caleb, strong in faith as well as courage, says, "if the Lord be with him, he shall surely be able to drive out."

MARY. I am glad the old man was so bold, and so well rewarded; it is pleasant, Mama, to see the Bible promises come so often true!

Mama. "Often," Mary! say always, and your remark will indeed be just. And this is one great advantage of an unbroken study of Scripture—that those who follow its regular thread, are made aware of a thousand coincidences between promise and fulfilment, which the desultory reader has neither time nor opportunity to trace. You will not now, I think, be tempted to repent that we read a "little more about the children of Israel!"

Let us see what new particulars in their marvellous history we can glean from the parting ad dress of Joshna; but not without first noticing his admirable exhortations. To what do they chiefly relate?

MARY, Oh, the same things as Moses'—"keeping all that was written in the book of the law," and "cleaving to the Lord," and "not serving or bowing down to the gods of the nations that remained among them."

Mama. And were these easy, as well as imperative precepts, afterwards fulfilled by his hearers?

MARY. Oh! no; they broke them all very often, as soon as Joshua was gone.

MAMA. And what did the "spirit of prophecy" chable him in that case to assure them of?

MARY. "Know for a certainty, that the Lord your God will no more drive out any of the nations from before you; but they shall be snares and traps unto you, and scourges in your sides, and thorns in your eyes, until ye perish from off this good land, which the Lord your God hath given you."

Mama. That their heathen neighbours proved the former, may be read in the shameless and endless idolatries adopted from them by Israel. And how thoroughly, in punishment of these, they became the latter, we shall soon have the whole neook of Judges to inform us. That these evils should not overtake them unwarned, or unstimulated to a better course, was the object of Joshua, in his grateful recapitulation of God's goodness to their nation, from its very origin in the person of their father Abraham. Like them, he had been taken "from the other side the flood," and led by God, a "stranger and a sojourner," through that very Canaan where, by the same hand, his ungrateful progeny were now firmly established. Did their faith and devotion to God, under such greatly superior advantages, for a moment equal or even emulate his?

MARY. Oh! no. Abraham believed God when things seemed most unlikely, and his children never did, even when his miracles were before their eyes.

MAMA. A very good, and alas! just distinction between "living by faith" a pilgrim on earth, like Abraham, and having the "eyes blinded," and the heart hardened, by the very temporal gifts of God, like the carnal unthankful Israelites. Had there not been something peculiar in the way in which these were bestowed, which should have excited them doubly to gratitude? What says the 13th verse?

MARY. "I have given you a land for which ye did not labour, and cities which ye built not.

and ye dwell in them. Of the vineyards and oliveyards which we planted not, do ye eat."

MAMA. A rare, may unique, instance of the depopulation of a whole country, for the express advantage and accommodation of those who had not (except in the promise of Jehovah) a title to so much as a "footbreadth" of this terrestrial paradise! But what is the inference drawn by Joshua from this unparalleled installation?

Me.v. "Now therefore fear the Lord, and serve has in sincerity and in trath." And he bid them "choose that day between Him and the gods of Egypt, and those of the Amorites." A pretty comparison! if they had had sense to make it properly!

MAMA. But who at least showed that in his mind the choice was made, and irrevocable?

Many. Joshna, Mama; he never hesitated, but says, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." But the very people cried, "God forbid that we should forsake the Lord!" Did they really mean what they said?

MAMA. Yes, at the time, I suppose, overawed and shamed by the manly resolution of Joshua. But had the prayer (for such the expression literally is) ascended from humble as well as devoted hearts, it never could have been so soon not only unfulfilled, but belied. How does Joshua indeed insinuate their unfitness in their own strength, for the great task they had so lightly undertaken.

Many. "Ye cannot serve the Lord, for He is an holy God. He is a jealous God. He will not forgive your transgressions nor your sins."

MAMA. It would be well if this humbling and salutary view of the justice and holiness of Him we serve, entered oftener into even the Christian's contemplation. God in Christ is neither less " jealous" nor less "hely" than of old, else the sacrifice of Calvary would not have shaken earth to its centre, more awfully far than the thunders of Sinai. And that we "cannot serve the Lord," except in a higher and purer nature than our own, is only become more sadly true, since men have seen exemplified in the character of Christ, that " perfect obedience" with which alone the Father is "well pleased." As Joshua, however, takes advantage of the very presumption of the Israelites, to bind them, by their voluntary declaration, to fidelity to God, it would be well if the vows we too have made at baptism were borne in mind as a talisman against their open and flagrant vio-While on the subject of confirmation of oaths, it is a singular coincidence, that the Oak of Shechem, where "all the people and Joshua set up a great stone for a memorial," was probably the very spot where the Lord first appeared unto Abraham, and made with him the covenant, now ratified by his descendants. What else, confirmatory of the above supposition, is recorded as having been done in Shechem?

MARY. Oh! burying the bones of Joseph, which they had brought out of Egypt, in the "parcel of ground which Jacob had bought for an hundred pieces of silver."

MAMA. A transaction which stamped his belief that it should hereafter be the heritage of his children. Where do we read were the remains of good Joshua laid?

MARY. "In the border of his inheritance"—oh! Mama! we have his exact age here, "an hundred and ten years old."

MAMA. You see we rather underrated it. But what name, more precious far than earthly titles of honour, accompanied the leader of Israel to his peaceful grave?

MARY. "Joshua, the son of Nun, the servant of the Lord."

MAMA. The noblest inscription, Mary, which can adorn, on this side of eternity, the good man's tomb; and the only one which will survive the ruin of empires, and the wreck of worlds. To what other eminent person might it, about the same time, have been applied?

MARY. Eleazar, the son of Aaron, I suppose.

MAMA. Yes; for the same faithful and zealous discharge of his sacerdotal duties, as Joshua had manifested in more secular affairs. And how long did the memory of these worthies continue to hallow and influence the conduct of their successors?

MARY. " All the days of the elders that overlived Joshua, and which had known all the works of the Lord."

MAMA. You see here the beneficial effects of a privilege not always sufficiently valued or improved, viz. that of personal intercourse with the "excellent of the earth." Not only did the contemporaries of Joshua remain faithful themselves, but they were enabled by their influence to keep others in the same right path. How diligently, then should we improve, and how highly should we prize (in youth especially), all opportunities of "sitting at the feet" of, or "taking sweet counsel together" with, those who, in our more favoured day, are "burning and shining lights"—shewing forth the power of the gospel in their devotion to God, and its beauty, in their love to their fellow creatures.

MORNING EIGHTH.

LESSON-Judges, Chapters i. and ii.

Mana! you have told me that Moses and Joshua both put down the things that happened in their time, but I should like to know, before I read it, who wrote this book of Judges?

And I should like extremely to be able to tell you with certainty who its good and pious, and in some passages, highly eloquent, author was. It has been variously ascribed to Phineas (the son of Eleazar the priest)—to King Hezekiah-to Ezekiel the Prophet-and also to Ezra, the restorer after the captivity, of the laws and polity of Israel. But a far more likely and well warranted conclusion is, that it was drawn up by Samuel, whom the Chronicles expressly represent as an historian; and who, living and judging Isracl in times immediately subsequent to the events described in this book, must have been much better able to record them than a writer of later days, independently of his higher qualifications as a prophet, under the immediate inspiration of God. There are minor circumstances, too, which fix its date long prior to the age of Hezekiah or Ezekiel. such as the " Jebusites dwelling," at the time it was written, "with the children of Benjamin,"whence (as we have incidentally had occasion to notice) they were finally expelled in the reign of David. Be the writer who he may, he is evidently one not unworthy to record the dealings of God with his chosen people, or to succeed, as the chronicler of their humiliating rebellions, and wonderful deliverances, the meek Moses and invincible Nor was, as we shall soon see from the book itself, the line of wise judges, or valiant champions, permitted to terminate with the death of the eminent men, whose "gathering to their fathers" marked the accomplishment of the promises of God, and the entrance of the people they had so long led into Canaan.

MARY. But Joshua does not seem to have had any one appointed to succeed him like Moses?

MAMA. No; the tribes seem to have been purposely left to their natural leaders, to prove which of them would act in the spirit of the commands of God, by at once dispossessing the Canaanites from their allotted portion.

Which tribes do we find, at the very beginning of the book, thus actively and laudably engaged?

M RY Judah was the first to go, but then Got in self said it should be so.

May a. Yes; thus confirming the pre-eminence which, in all future times, the tribe of Judah seems to be enjoyed, and which, in this instance, was accompanied by a signal victory over their enemic. What tribe do we find associated in the perils and glory of this pious enterprize?

MALY. Simeon, Mama. You know that cribe live' beside Judah, and had no portion of its ow.

MAMA. Well remembered. These tribes were also more straitly united than others, by their descent from the same mother, their fathers being both sons of Leah. The leaven of "cruelty" (with which they were reproached by Jacob) seems yet to have adhered to the latter, in the severity exercised towards Adonibezek. But how was it justified by the then existing law of retaliation?

MARY. Because he had done the same to "three score and ten kings," and, for this, he says himself, "God requited him." But what could have put it into his heart to treat any one so strangely?

MAMA. By thus mutilating his unhappy prisoners, he utterly incapacitated them from bearing arms any more; and this, no doubt, (as well as the just punishment of his pride) was the object of the Israelites in his own case. He did not long, however, survive, but fell a victim to shame and remorse.

MARY. Mama! Here we have Jerusalem taken by the children of Judah! I thought you said it was not done till David's time.

MAMA. I am glad you observed this; but you might have seen (a little farther in our chapter) that it was Benjamites who failed to drive out those Jebusites who occupied their portion of the site of the holy city. Do you remember which part, we learned lately, that was?

Many. Oh! yes; the spot where the temple stood afterwards. You told me, this fulfilled what Moses had prophesied, that the "Lord should dwell between the shoulders of Benjamin, and cover him all the day long."

MAMA. A wonderful coincidence, with which, like many others, I was unacquainted, till digging in the exhaustless mine of Scripture, my dear child, for your information. But Hebron is another town very famous in Jewish story, and was, till the final taking of Jerusalem, the chief city of the nation. By whom did we lately read it was fought against and taken?

MARY. Caleb, Mama; but then it was called Kirjath Arba, because of the giants who lived there; and he said he would give his daughter to whoever took Kirjath-sepher, and his own nephew was the bold man, and won her.

MAMA. Are you aware of the peculiar nature and importance of the "blessing," which, as a reward this bravery, his bride took upon her to reque to make father?

My ses, you have often explained to me how on "springs of water" were in the dry counc of Judea.

Mama. But what strange pilgrims, from a far distant land, do we next find claiming and enjoying an inheritance among Israel? How came the "children of Moses's father-in-law" to have left "keeping their father's flock in Horeb," for a secure and fertile dwelling in Judah?

MARY. I don't know.

MAMA. What! have you forgotten Moses saying to Hobab, "Come with us to the land to which we are journeying, and we will do thee good, for the Lord bath spoken good concerning Israel?" Do you think this Arab of the desert now repented having exchanged, at the persuasion of his brother-in-law, the uncertain lawless life of a Bedonin, for the safety and plenty of the promised land? No. And thus, be assured, will it be with those who resign the world's unlicensed freedom for the far more rich as well as "glorious liberty of the sons of God."

MARY. Mama! I see Judah went on driving out the Canaanites from the mountain; but it says they "could not drive out those of the valley, hecause they had chariots of iron." Surely God could enable them to do so in spite of any chariots!

MAMA. Your remark is quite just; and shows you to be sensible that it was not power in Jehovah, but faith and courage in Judah to profit by it, that were wanting. The same shameful deficiency seems to have induced the Benjamites to dwell for centuries intermixed with the heathen Jehusites; to the injury, as we shall soon see, of their general morals, and their constant es posure to examples of idolatry, which they were but too prone to follow.

MARY. The 6 house of Joseph" were wiser. They went up against Bethel, and the Lord was with them, and they took it. Manu! a man of that place seems to have behaved something like Rahab, and to have been rewarded in the same way!

MAMA. Yes, with his life, and that of his family; but, as he chose to settle among his heathen neighbours the Hittites, conversion to the true God was not, I fear, added to temporal safety. We shall soon see what evils, both temporal and spiritual, arose to the remaining tribes of Israel from singler association, inexcusable in their case, whatever they might be in that of an ignorant Canaania. Do you remember for what Bethel (the city of God, as the pious house of Joseph now named as became in after times sadly remarkable?

MAI Was it not there that Jeroboam set up his gol cases, which "made Israel to sin?"

My the s; when the half tribe of Ephraim, the unverthy descendants of pious Joseph, having shared the revolt of the ten tribes, partook also in the idolatry which was its cause and punishment.

But, Mary, in what solemn and authoritative manner do we find the timidity and disobedience of the greater part of the tribes reproved in the second of this day's chapters? Who is said to "come up" for the purpose from Gilgal to Bochim (or Shiloh) and here rebuke the assembled tribes?

Mary. " An angel of the Lord."

MAMA. And would a simple heavenly messenger have thus taken upon him?

MARY. Oh! no; it must have been the same who spoke from the burning bush, for he says, "I made you to go up out of Egypt," and "I have brought you unto the land which I sware unto your fathers; and I said I will-never break my covenant with you;" and I suppose the people knew, too, that it was God who reproached them, for they "lifted up their voice and wept."

MAMA. Probably so; and such was the violence of their grief, that the place derived from it the name of "Bochim," or "weepers." But though they seemed to renew, by an immediate sacrifice, their broken covenant with God, we do not find that the "obedience" (which He hath said is "better than sacrifice,") attested the sincerity of their repentance; and therefore do we find that no sooner were the "elders who outlived Joshna," and whose example, no doubt, had some weight in restraining the spread of idolatry, gathered to their fathers, than "the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord, and served Baalim."

MARY. Mama! does "Baalim," here, mean the Baalzebub we found mentioned in other parts of the Bible?

MAMA. Alas! my dear Mary, "Baalim" is a plural term, and means (as the Scriptures elsewhere express it) "Lords many and Gods many." It is applied to all the various idols of the Canamite nations, but especially to their chief divinities, the sun and moon, the latter of whom, Ashtaroth, under the blasphemous name of the "Queen of Heaven," we said lately was a favourite object of worship with the idolatrons daughters of Israel.

But we must hasten to draw from the third of those chapters, (which a desire to keep unbroken the history of Deborah and Barak obliged me to include in this day's reading,) the particulars of those chastisements which were in the second held out as the natural consequence of idolatry; and the temporal deliverances which the God, who in the "midst of judgment, remembereth mercy," occasionally afforded them.

Which of the nations with whom God, in anger, now suffered Israel to remain intermingled and surrounded, first vindicated his threatenings, and requited their sinful alliances and intermarriages with them, by tyranny and oppression?

MARY. "God sold them into the hand of the king of Mesopotamia." That was where Abraham came from, was it not?

MAMA. Yes: and a just requital of the Israelites' forgetfulness of the signal mercy by which their ancestor had been called from thence, and from idolatry, through faith in those very promises his descendants were now undervaluing and abusing. How long were they "sold to," or tributaries to this distant monarch?

MARY. Eight years; and it was brave Othniel, the husband of Caleb's daughter, who delivered them.

Mama. Yes; when strengthened and inspired for the patriotic enterprize, by the "Spirit of the Lord." How long did the rest thus purchased for the land, endure? MARY. Forty years; I suppose till Othniel died.
MAMA. Yes, with the first of the judges "raised up" by God, and the only one of whom some great human weakness, or even gross transgression, is not (for man's abasement and God's exaltation) recorded—seem to have expired alike the short-lived amendment, and consequent "rest," of the people he ruled over.

Whom did God next make his instrument for chastising them?

MARY. He "strengthened Eglon, King of Moab, against Israel, because they had done evil in the sight of the Lord;" and they served him eighteen years, instead of eight.

Mama. I see by your countenance that you are perplexed by something in the vengeance—a bloody one—executed on him by Ehud.

MARY. Oh! Mama you always know what I am thinking! but I wish Ehud had not pretended to carry a present when he went to kill the king of Moab, or said he had a message to him from God.

MAMA. It is quite natural and proper for a young mind to revolt from apparent treachery, even when inspired by the most laudable motives. But you will be relieved to find that the "present" which distresses you, was only the customary and iniquitous "tribute" imposed by Eglon on the Israelites, of which Ehud, as bearer, gained admittance to the heathen tyrant; and that the "message from God" (which in one sense indeed, and that a terrible one, Ehud was commissioned to deliver) is presumed by learned men to have been met by the king with apparent reverence, not as the decree of the God of Israel (whom he neither knew nor acknowledged), but as the result of some heathen oracle of divination.

But be this as it may, remember once for all, that the cruel and even sinful actions of men, overruled by God for the accomplishment of His purposes of wrath, to which (as we formerly remarked) amiable or peaceful characters, would be wholly unsuited, are nowhere in Scripture held out either for our praise or imitation. This remark, applicable to all the Old Testament, we shall have to bear in mind especially, throughout the whole book of Judges. But instead of "wresting," as scoffers have done, such instances "to their own destruction," and the disparagement of God's glory, let us bow in deeper admiration of the counsels of Him who, as we observed on entering on our present course of instructive readingmaketh the "wrath of men to praise Him," and still bends to his sovereign purposes, the "unruly wills and affections," as well of the enemies who resist, as of the instruments who promote them.

MORNING NINTH.

LESSON,-Judges, Chapters iv. and v.

Mama. I have remarked with pleasure, my dear Mary, from the spirit and emphasis with which you have read these two chapters-the lively interest which has been awakened in your breast-by the noble display they afford of female heroism and eloquence. They must be cold and callous indeed-dead alike to piety and patriotism —by whom the exploits of Deborah, that woman " valiant for the truth," or the yet more admirable hymn in which the glory of them is ascribed to the God of Israel-can be perused without kindred emotions! But how came the Israelites once more into slavery-to whom God had so lately given deliverance by the dagger of Ehud, and by that yet more apparently inadequate instrument, the ox-goad of Shamgar? which, however, I ought to mention, is still in Palestine a formidable weapon. eight feet long, and of which (in allusion to the very slaughter made by Shamgar) a modern traveller thus speaks: "I am confident, that whoever should see one of them, as commonly used in all these parts, would pronounce it a weapon not less fit, perhaps fitter, than a sword, for such an execution." Deliverance having, by these simple means, been wrought twice for Israel, how came the nation to fall once more under the yoke of slavery?

MARY. Oh! for the old reason, "they did evil again in the sight of the Lord, when Ehud was dead?"

MAMA. This last phrase, which implies that for fourscore years his influence had been successfully exerted to keep them faithful to God, may serve to correct the uncharitable judgment which, from his being the minister of Divine vengeance on Eglon, you were inclined to pass on him yesterday. None but a pious and able man could have restrained so long the idolatrous propensities of his countrymen. Into whose power were they now delivered?

MARY. Jabin, king of Canaan, who reigned at Hazor. This was their own fault, Mama! for you know if they had done as God commanded, there would long ago have been no kings of Canaan at all.

MAMA. True, Mary; sloth and negligence, distrust of God, and false confidence in themselves, were with them as with us, the fruitful source of sorrow and discomfiture.

MARY. Ah! and I see why they had not put down Jabin, when they might have done so. I suppose, because of his nine hundred chariots, which you know they were terribly afraid of.

MAMA. Very likely; and the oppression they endured seems to have been proportioned to such base timidity. How long did it continue?

MARY. "Twenty years he mightily oppressed the children of Israel." Surely they might have "cried to God" sooner, and he would have helped them long before that time!

Mama. Don't be too sure, Mary. The penitence of nations, as well as of individuals, is often, tried by delay in the Divine mercy; nor is it the uniform effect of calamity, public or private, to bring transgressors immediately to the throne of grace. Some it disheartens, others it even utterly hardens, and it is seldom, till human means have been exhausted, and found powerless, that any betake themselves in sincerity, to the offended majesty of Heaven. But by what feeble and unusual instrument did God, in His own good time, redress the wrongs of his people?

Mary. A woman, Mama! I know there were prophetesses, but I never heard of a female judge before.

MAMA. They are (as we remarked of the former class) thus sparingly exhibited in Scripture, that women may never be tempted by ambition to forego their more legitimate ornament of a "meek and quiet spirit;" while the few instances recorded are sufficient to keep up in all, a due respect for the sex which (on rare and special occasions) God himself has thus "delighted to honour." From what primitive throne did this female "seer" administer "judgment" to the children of Israel?

MARY. She "dwelt under the palm tree of Deborah, between Ramah and Bethel."

MAMA. Both places famous for sanctity, and the former afterwards the residence of a greater than Deborah—even the famous prophet and judge of Israel—Samuel. By what message, wholly beyond the province of an uninspired female, did Deborah prove her claim to the title of a prophetess, and awake the slumbering courage of Barak?

MARY. She said God had commanded him "to draw toward Mount Tabor, with ten thousand men of Zabulon and Naphtali;" and that God would deliver Sisera, the captain of Jabin's army into his hand.

MAMA. You are, I daresay, unaware of the circumstances which, according to modern travellers, rendered Tabor a peculiarly eligible rendezvous for troops in a hostile country. It not only stood on the confines of many different tribes, but while it was inaccessible to the chariots and horses of the enemy, it had on its smannit, a plain (still said to exhibit remains of ancient fortifications), on which the little army of Barak could be conveniently disciplined. But did these natural advantages satisfy him of the practicability of the enterprize?

MARY. No: he said he would not go, unless Deborah went too. Surely it was cowardly in a man to refuse to stir without a woman!

MAMA. Remember that the "woman" was a prophetess, and as such calculated to animate the valour, and secure the obedience, of his soldiers. But though the request was complied with, her answer intimated that his want of faith and courage would be appropriately punished. How was this?

MARY. "The journey was not to be for his honour," and God was to "sell Sisera into the hand of a woman." Mama I I am afraid to be rash, after what you said yesterday, but I don't think it could be for her honour either. Surely it was shocking in a woman to drive a nail through a man's head that was sleeping in her tent!

MAMA. Far be it from me, Mary, ever to blame the natural recoil of youth and innocence from deeds of treachery and blood! But to judge fairly of such, at the distance of centuries, and with the mild light of Christianity to make them shew doubly dark and repulsive in our eyes, we must not forget the rules laid down by the same blessed Gospel, for estimating the conduct and motives of others. We must transport ourselves to the rude lawless age, and wild savage deserts, in which Jael lived; we must view her as a member of a trampled and oppressed race of slaves, into whose hand God had placed, as by miracle, the power of terminating by a blow that intolerable slavery, ere we can appreciate the force of the temptation, or rather impulse, to which (at the risk of her own life had the sleeping warrior been roused by the attempt) this heroic daughter of the desert sacrificed the natural horror of her sex for blood. Nay, we should remember, that, as an Arab woman (which being descended from Hobab the Kenites all were) she infringed, to deliver her Jewish adopted country, maxims dearer to this day, to her race, than even the feelings of sex, or the relentings of humanity. Within the sacred shelter of his tent, no Bedouin would even now (especially after offering him the refreshment of milk) take the life of the murderer of his only son. It must therefore have been a higher and purer motive far than human revenge, which nerved the arm, and steeled the soal, of Jaci to become the executioner of one doomed by Jehovah. Let the effect of the whole striking history upon ourselves, instead of harsh coadenmation of an act, which change of times and happier circumstances forbid us adequately to appreciate, be thankfulness to God for that milder dispensation of His providence, and purer revelation of His will, which renders it impossible that women can ever be called on to cherish even the thought of vengeance, far less to pollute themselves with deeds of blood!

But your natural remark has led us to anticipate.—How came Sisera, a fugitive, into the power of Jacl?

MARY. Oh, Mama! it was sure to happen, you know, because God said it. All his nine hundred chariots could do him no good, for he "field away on his feet," and his hosts were disconfited with the edge of the sword before Barak, " and there was not a man left."

MAMA. A victory both in magnitude and completeness worthy of Him by whose Spirit it had been predicted, and by whose mighty arm it was achieved! Nor is the noble ode of triumph which follows unworthy of the glorious theme. But before we re-echo its notes of praise, let us enhance for a moment the triumphant strain, by a view of the far different anticipations with which the return of the slain commander was already, in imagination, hailed by his mother and her attendants.

MARY. Mama! I can't help being sorry for the mother of Sisera.

Mama. In so saying, you only add your unsophisticated homage to the truth and nature which have been universally felt to pervade these effusions of maternal pride and tenderness. Long, long indeed, would the mother of Siscra continue to look through the lattice in vain for his triumphant return; nor is it known whether she ever enjoyed the poor gratification of recovering his inanimate remains. Be this as it may, the passage must ever exhibit an additional proof, that "He who knew what was in man," dictated even the interesting episodes which adorn the history of the Bible.

But we must go back a little, and analyze the "song of praise" of Deborah. What does it begin by commemorating?

MARY. The "avenging of Israel."

MAMA. Yes, thereby ascribing unreservedly all the glory to Him to whom it was due, and calling in a sublime strain all the kings and princes of the trembling earth to bear witness to His supremacy. But after exhausting the loftiest terms to express the alarm and submission with which God's mighty works in behalf of Israel had once inspired the neighbouring nations, in what humiliating contrast is the situation of the former placed, when, by "corrupting their way," they had provoked the Lord to forsake them?

MARY. It says, that " in the days of Shamgar the highways were unoccupied, and the travellers walked through by-ways; and the inhabitants of the villages ceased." Was this because of robbers, or for fear of the king of Hazor's people?

MAMA. Both probably, for the same "corruption" which exposed them to the latter grievance would surely entail the former curse also. The root of the whole evil occurs in the next verse—what was it?

MARY. "They chose new gods," and "then," it adds, "was war in the gates."

MAMA. And by what defenceless state of the once chosen nation, is Shamgar's choice of an oxquad to fight with, at once explained?

Mary. "There was not a shield or a spear among forty thousand in Israel!"

MAMA. Even so, one of the first acts of their conquerors seeming to have always been (as we shall see more fully exemplified in the case of the Philistines) disarming their unhappy vassals. Does not this scarcity of arms make the victory just achieved by the Israelites both more wonderful in itself, and more decidedly of God?

MARY. Oh! yes. But is not Deborah a little too proud? She says all this happened till "she arose, a mother in Israel." Surely it was God who raised her up, and not she herself.

MAMA. A truth, Mary, which none can suspect so pious a woman, even in the exultation of her heart, of ever forgetting. So far from arrogating to herself any merit in the recent deliverance, she not only says, "The Lord made me have dominion over the mighty," but expressly calls on the governors and great men among her people, to "rehearse" with her "the mighty acts of the Lord;" by which those who could formerly not even draw water unmolested by the "noise of archers," might now, as "His people, go down free to their gates!" Did you observe how these men, who "sit in judgment," are here addressed by Deborah?

MARY. "Ye that ride on white asses." You have often told me, when speaking of our Lord's entry into Jerusalem, that, so far from being a mean way of travelling, it was used by all the great people among the Jews.

MAMA. Yes, partly from the absence of horses, to "multiply" which, we have lately seen, was prohibited, and partly from the immense superiority of the ass of those countries over the despised and degraded animal of our own.

But after distributing praise to such of the tribes as (like Zebulon) "jeoparded their lives unto the death," and reproaches to others, who (like Dan) "remained" unconcerned in their ships, what extraordinary and supernatural allies does this inspired woman represent as joining with Israel in the battle of the Lord?

MARY. She says, "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera;" and the "river, the ancient river Kishon, swept them away."

MAMA. By this noble figure of speech, she is thought to denote such thunders, lightning, and rain, as have often (as if sent from heaven) added to the discomfiture of routed armies; and by which the rapid torrent of the Kishon was swelled, till, with devastating fury, it swept the remnant of the host of Sisera before it.

And now, with the emphatic curse on "Meroz," for its backwardness in the service of the Lord (which the learned consider to be fulfilled by the very memory of its name and site having perished from the earth), we must conclude our review of the Song of Deborah—the poetry and sublimity of which even infidels have acknowledged; while Christians may draw from it an example of praise, for still nobler victory and

MORNING TENTIL

Lesson-Judges, Chapters vi, vii, and viii.

Mama. These three chapters, which, as comprising the history of the same eminent individual, it would have been improper to separate, place before us a fresh series of transgressions, and consequent miseries on the side of the Israelites, and of pardon and relief on the part of Him who "delighteth in mercy." No sooner indeed, throughout the whole book, do we see the champions successively raised up by God, gathered to their fathers, or does a generation arise by whom their exploits are forgotten, than idolatry, disobedience, and rebellion, "come in" again "like a flood," bringing with them oppression and tyranny, as their just and predicted punishment. How long had the "land rest" after he victory over Sisera?

Mary. Forty years; I suppose till the death of Deborah.

MAMA. And from what quarter, not altogether an alien one, did the chastisement of the "evil doings" of the children of Israel this time come?

MARY. "The Lord delivered them for seven years into the hand of Midian," and "the children of the East" came up against them.

MAMA. Can you tell me by what ties of blood both should have been restrained from persecuting Israel?

MARY. I don't know any. Who were the Midianites?

Mama. Descendants of Abraham, by his second wife Keturah: who, though like the sons of Ishmael (here called "Children of the East") not partakers in the spiritual blessings confined to the progeny of Isaac, had received from their wealthy parent an inheritance ample enough to have induced them to cultivate friendly feelings towards the elder branch of their common family. Yet so far was this from being the case, that their cruelty seems to have driven the children of Israel to a pitch of distress not before mentioned; what was it?

Mary. They were obliged to make caves and dens in the rocks to hide in; and the Midianites destroyed all the corn they had sown, and "left no sustenance for Israel, neither sheep, nor ox, nor ass."

MAMA. Did you observe by what means this dreadful desolation was accomplished? Did they march armies alone into the ravaged land of Israel?

MARY. No; "they came up as grasshoppers for multitude; for both they and their camels were without number; and they entered into the land to destroy it."

MAMA. If you had comprised in one sentence all the accounts given us by travellers, from that day to the present, of the wandering habits and predatory incursions of the Arabs, you could not have drawn a truer picture of a race who still swarm periodically out of their deserts into the neighbouring countries; settling down with their rude tents and countless flocks of camels and horses, till every green thing vanishes as effectually before them as before the flights of locusts (not grasshoppers, as we translate it), to whom they are here compared.

What was the effect on Israel of this fearful visitation?

MARY. They " cried unto the Lord," and the Lord sent them a prophet.

MAMA. And did he immediately, as in former cases, promise them deliverance?

MARY. No, no; he only seems to have reminded them, in God's name, how far they had disobeyed Him. But an angel came to Gideon, who, I suppose, was better than his wicked neighbours, and served the true God.

MAMA. An angel, Mary! Have we not positive reason to conclude the celestial visitant to be a higher person far?

Many. Let me see—oh' yes, I did not observe. He says to Gideon, "Have not I sent thee?"

MAMA. Even Gideon, ignorant as he was seems to have understood this, for he calls him at once "My Lord;" and the Jews universally acknowledge it, from the name Jehovah (which we translate Lord) being in the narrative ascribed to the speaker. What was Gideon's humble occupation when thus admitted to the presence of God?

MARY. 6 Thrashing wheat," Mama, to hide it from the Midianites.

MAMA. Yes, beating it (which the word here signifies) in a private corner, with a stick, not during to tread it out boldly as usual with oxen, for fear of the robbers by whom he was surrounded. By what lofty title was this timid young husbandman unexpectedly accosted?

MARY. "The Lord is with thee, thou mighty man of valour!" How surprised he must have been to hear himself called so!

MAMA. Yes, Mary, and sinful as was no doubt the distrust of God implied in his first answer, the personal humility which accompanied must in some degree have atoned it. How does he chain that epithet of "mighty," which sounded are is eas like a mockery?

MARC. "O my Lord, wherewithal shall I save I statel? Behold my family is poor in Manasset, and I am the least in my father's house." Mana! Moses was just the same, till God said "I vo ad be with him."

NAMA. And the same gracious promise ought to have satisfied Gideon. Human nature, however, was weak in both, and both "required a sign of the Lord." But how did Gideon first prove his piety, and consequent claim to so great a favour?

Many. He besought the angel to stay till he went for a "prescut," and he brought one of "flesh, and broth, and cakes." Surely, Mama, if he knew it was "the Lord," bringing him food was useless!

MAMA. It was precisely his "knowing it to be the Lord," that made the "meat offering" (here erroneously translated "present") peculiarly appropriate, and as such acceptable. It was a religious sacrifice, by which, in the overflowing of a grateful heart, Gideon sought to entitle himself o the continued favour of his God. How was its acceptance manifested?

MARY. Fire came out of the rock when the angel touched it with his staff, and consumed the sacrifice, and then Gideon first knew for certain that he had seen the Lord face to face, and was afraid. But the Lord said, "Peace be unto thee, fear not, thou shalt not die."

MAMA. Observe the pions spirit in which Gideon immediately commemorated this gracious assurance, by building an altar, and calling it "Jehovah-shalon," or "the Lord send Peace," But what vindication of God's awful majesty must take place, ere even the good intentions of a pious heart could find acceptance?

MARY. Gideon was first to throw down his father's altar to Baal, and the grove that was beside it. How strange that an idolatrons father should have so good a son! I wonder if he had once worshipped Baal too?

MAMA. Very possibly; but, if so, "the days of that ignorance God winked at," in consideration of the holy zeal and boldness with which he now set about his perilous task. What time was he obliged to choose for the work of destruction, among a people, alas! "wholly given to idolatry?"

MARY. The night, Mama; and when morning came, and they saw Baal's altar down, and another built in its place, they told Gideon's father to bring out his son that he might die. MAMA. And how was this demand of a whole enraged people met by one of the humblest among them? Did he entreat them to spare his son, or make any apology for him?

Myny. No, he behaved with more sense and spira; telling them, that, if Baal was a God, he could very well plead for himself, and punish the man who threw down his altar.

M MA. Does this remind you of another ironical  $\phi$  ech to the same effect, made on a similar occasion, not by a converted idolater, but by a faithful servant of God?

MARY. Oh! yes; Elijah mocked the priests of Baal in the same way, and said, he must be "sleeping" or "gone on a journey," when he did not answer their prayers. It was very bold in both, Mama, but especially in Joash, and I wonder the people minded him.

MAMA. Truth will often prevail, Mary, even with an incensed multitude, and the consciences of some at least among them must have been " on the Lord's side."

But what still more formidable enemies did Gideon's bold attack on idolatry provoke?

MARY. All the Midianites, and Amalekites, and children of the east, were gathered together in Jezreel. But Gideon was not afraid; for the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, and he blew a trumpet, and sent messengers and gathered an army too.

MAMA. So far his conduct was courageous as well as prudent. But did he, without farther misgivings, confide in the promise of the Lord, "Surely I will be with thee, and thou shalt smite the Midianites as one man?"

MARY. No; he still wanted the "sign" he had asked for before, to make sure that God would indeed save Israel. How foolish not to believe him at once!

MAMA. It is a folly, Mary, which thousands to this day share with the far less culpable husbandman of Manasseh, the least in an obscure family of an insignificant tribe in Israel. You are ready to blame Gideon for not at once recognizing in himself the future deliverer of Israel, and conqueror of Midian; what shall we say of those for whom deliverance and conquests have actually been achieved, and who yet hesitate to appropriate to themselves the benefits of the victory? Are not their doubts more sinful far, and more insulting to God, than the test proposed by the simple shepherd of Manasseh?

MARY. None but a shepherd lad would surely have thought of such a miracle. It seems very childish.

MAMA. When talking once of miracles, did we say it was their magnitude and importance only which proved them to be such?

MARY. No; for you told me the swimming of an iron axe-head on the waters of Jordan was as much a miracle as feeding five thousand men with a few loaves and fishes.

MANY. True; and why? do you remember?
MARY. Because none but God could change or int. ifere with the laws of nature, and it was not natural for iron to swim.

MAMA. I am glad you have understood as well as recollected the test by which the genuineness of all miracles, whether great or small (as you would call them) must be tried. Was it natural, then, for dew to fall on all around, while the fleece of Gideon remained dry, or again to fall on it alone?

MARY. Oh! no; I see that few miracles could be more difficult, though I thought little of it at first.

Mama. If you had thought a little more deeply now, you would have seen that the word "difficulty" is altogether out of place, in speaking of that which can only be performed by Omnipotence. To Him who made the world, all interruptions of its order are alike possible and easy. But, for finite minds like ours, it is indeed "difficult" to get rid of a different impression! Did the "sign" required satisfy Gideon?

MARY. Yes; when God had kindly done it for him a second time. But why, in the world, Mama, did God make him send away almost all his army, when the Midianites were so many and strong?

MAMA. For the reason assigned by Himself, "lest Israel vaunt themselves against me, saying, Mine own hand hath saved me."

MARY. Ah! I had overlooked that. But what a curious method was taken to find out which were to stay! It seemed almost as trifling as the fleece of Gideon.

MAMA. On the contrary, it only proved, that He who, in the eloquent language of Job, is called the Father " of the drops of dew," is a " discerner also of the hearts of the children of men." Many have supposed that the various modes of drinking resorted to by the warriors of Gideon, shewed a greater or less degree of effeminacy and weakness, or of courage and resolution. But He who "knew what was in man" needed no such external indications; and, when we consider the nature of the victory which, by means of the three hundred left, God was about to accomplish, their greater or less share of strength and courage was of very little consequence. Under what homely figure was this great discomfiture predicted in a dream to a man of Israel?

Mary. It was as odd as all the rest. He dreamed that a barley cake rolled into the camp of Midian, and threw down the tents.

MAMA. Yes; and God permitted Gideon to overhear the inspired application of the dream to himself, from which, with his usual piety, he drew materials for praise and encouragement. But, with what singular weapons did he arm his little band of chosen followers?

MARY. With "trumpets and pitchers, and lamps a them." How could be think of such things?

MAMA. If the object was to create surprise and confusion in the unsuspecting camp of the enemy, I don't know that better could have been chosen. The blowing, all at once, of three hundred trumpets, must have fearfully awakened the slumbering Midianites; while the loud crash of the earthen jars, and sudden glare of the torches concealed in them, must have conspired to terrify and bewilder them. What do we find to have been the result of this night attack?

MARY. Oh! they were bewildered enough, for some killed each other, and the rest fled; and all Israel gathered against them, and took them, and cut off the heads of two of their princes.

MAMA. This will teach you, I think, not to undervalue, in future, the trifling means by which the greatest designs of Providence are frequently brought about. The same Being who invested the "trumpets" of Israel with power to level the proud walls of Jericho, could send home their blast with withering terror to the hearts of the cruel Midianites. But we must not forget the prevailing watchword with which the victory was led on and achieved: what was it?

MARY, ' The sword of the Lord and of Gideon."

MAMA. Yes; that direct acknowledgment of the presence and power of Jehovah, by which conquest among the Israelites never failed to be ushered in.

We must hasten over the comparatively unimportant details of the subseque virimphs of Gideon; only remarking that though, like other of the age, not unaccompanied with excessive severity and indulgence of personal revenge, they were, on the whole, in some measure palliated by acts of previous treachery on the part of their victims. Of the deaths of his brethren, he was, even by the law of Moses, the legal avenger; and "blood for blood" was the stern requisition of those iron times. Let us be thankful for living, when the most attached of relatives would shrink from imbruing his hands in that of even a brother's murderer! But while we lament the ferocity with which Gideon pursued his vengeance, let us do justice to his noble disinterestedness, and trae devotion to God, in rejecting the proposal of permanent sovereignty over Israel, which (in defiance of His express prohibition against kings,) was made him by its short-sighted rulers. How was this noble denial worded?

MARY. "I will not rule over you, neither shall my son rule over you. The Lord shall rule over you." This was quite right. But, Mama! I think "ear-rings" were always to be put to a bad use in the Bible; for Gideon's ephod was almost as wrong as Aaron's calf.

MAMA. It was, Mary; and like all the sins and weaknesses of the less faulty characters of Scripture, it is impartially recorded for our example and warning. From other errors of Gideon, our next reading will shew that lamentable consequences to his family sprung. But, in the mean time, let us draw from his chequered history deep insight into the mysterious ways of Providence, and a humbling conviction of the inherent sinfulness that cleaves to the best of its human instruments. Who can view Gideon as represented by the unerring hand of inspiration,-at once courageous and desponding, pious and distrustful, disdaining power, and yet abusing it for purposes of vengeance, without recognising a faithful picture of human inconsistency? Who can behold him one day "valiant for the truth" against a whole nation of idolaters; the next, refusing to lead the armies of Jehovah without the superfluous encouragement of a "sign from heaven;" in youth, overturning the cherished monuments of his paternal idol worship; and, in age, "making an ephod" for a snare to himself and his polluted household, without exclaiming, in humble recognition of infirmities from which none among us are exempt, "Lord, what is man that thou art mindful of him; or the son of man that thou shouldst visit him?"

MORNING ELEVENTH.

LESSON .- Juages, Chapters ix. and x.

Magia. The somewhat hurried manner in which the length of yesterday's reading obliged us to dismiss the latter portion of the life of Gideon, makes it expedient to look back to what is said of his surviving family, and their treatment by their countrymen, amid the renewed corruption which quickly ensued upon his death. How many sons did Gideon, or Jerubbaal, as he is in this day's reading called, leave?

Mary. Three score and ten; what a number! But it says he had many wives.

MAMA. Yes, Mary; in those primitive times, a plurality of wives was tolerated, if not expressly permitted among the Jews. But, in innumerable instances, besides the present (such as the families of David, of Solomon, and other rulers of Israel, who were led, by their wealth and power, to multiply these sources of domestic discord) great individual sorrows, as well as family misfortunes, were the consequence of a departure from the law of marriage, as wisely instituted by God Himself at the creation of the world. These were still farther aggravated, when, as in the case of Gideon himself, and even in that of Abraham the "friend of God," wives of inferior rank (chiefly female slaves) were added to the number; whose sons, like Ishmael, and Abimelech, and Absalom, having no lawful inheritance, or natural rank among their brethren, became turbulent and discontented; "their hand against every man, and every man's hand against them."

By what ingratitude on the part of the children of Israel was Abimelech's wicked designs against his brethren rendered easy of execution?

MARY. They " shewed no kindness to the house of Gideon, according to all the goodness which he had shewed unto Israel."

MAMA. Yes, Mary; even thus did the same volatile people, who "remembered not the Lord their God who delivered them on every side," neglect those very descendants of Gideon, whom they had clamoured to have for hereditary kings! But by what plausible arguments did Abimelech strive to stir up first his mother's family, and then all the men of Shechem, against the rest of his unhappy brethren?

MARY. " Whether is it better for you that all the sons of Jerubbaal, three score and ten persons, reign over you, or that one reign over you? Remember also that I am your bone and your flesh." I thought that Gideon had said that none of his sons should "rule over them."

MAMA. So did that, in many respects, wise and good man decide. But the ambition inseparable from persons born in an eminent station, probably led a! his sons, more or less, to aspire at dominion. If not, the words of Abimelech would have had less fatal weight. From what treasury was he supplied with the means of getting up his rebellion?

MARY. They gave him money out of the "house of Baalberith." Was he the same as Baal?

MAMA. The latter, you know, (which signifies Lord,) was a general name for the Canaanitish deities. The one particularly meant here, is supposed to have been so called from resenting broken covenants; perhaps as the avenger of the insult to idol worship offered by the courageous Gideon. But what use (quite of a piece with the source from whence it flowed,) did Abimelech make of this ill-gotten treasure?

MARY. He "hired vain and light persons) which followed him."

MAMA. Yes, of such are generally composed the chief abettors of every insurrection against lawful authority in church and state. From the recreant godless Levites, who mustered at the impious call of Korah, to "all who were in distress, or in debt, or discontented," who flocked to David (not as the chosen future king of Israel, but merely as an outlaw and fugitive from Saul), those two classes of supporters, the needy and irreligious, (as we are told "vain and light" should here be rendered), have ever abounded under the banners of revolt. The hateful character of the present tunult was soon proved by the massacre in which it terminated? What was the first act of Abimelech?

MARY. How shocking! He went to his own father's house, and slew his sixty brethren "all on one stone," all except Jotham, who hid himself. Mama! this was just like little Joash escaping from Athaliah.

MAMA. And two massacres of similar atrocity are happily unparalleled in Scripture. But learned men have supposed idolatry, as well as ambition, to have had its share in both; and that the "stone" on which Abimelech remorselessly sacrificed his brethren, was a fragment of the altar of Baal, overturned by his pious father. If this was indeed so, what memorial to the true God do we find to have been polluted by being the scene of the proclamation of Abimelech?

MARY. The pillar of Shechem. I forget about it.

MAMA. Don't you remember it was set up by Joshna (in the supposed place of God's first appearance to Abraham), as a perpetual memorial of the covenant between him and the children of Israel?

MARY. Yes, I remember now: it might have shamed these wicked murderers! But, Mama, does there not seem something childish in Jotham telling the people silly fables about "trees speaking," instead of reminding them at once (as he did afterwards), of the good his father had done them, and the bad return they had made for it?

MAMA. If we did not find that, to this day, such fictions are both acceptable and convincing to the people of the same countries, it might be esteemed "silly" to employ them. But the higher example of our Lord, who (though, as the author of all truth, he abstains from personification of inanimate objects), has perpetual recourse to imaginary circumstances to excite the attention of his hearers, has lent to the "parables" of the East a dignity and importance which must ever shield them from contempt. Even in this "silly fable," as you are tempted to call it, of Jotham, there is much ingenuity and force of rebuke; while, by ushering it in with an appeal to the true God, he gave it a strong claim on the conscience, as well as the understanding of his countrymen. What could more aptly illustrate the base and unworthy selection of the degenerate "son of a maid servant," to be their head and ruler, than the comparison of a rude and profitless bramble, exalted at the expense of the consecrated olive, and nutritious fig. and vine, "that maketh glad the heart of man?" Or what could more bitterly typify the ingratitude of the Israelites for the substantial benefits conferred on them by Gideon? So consciencestruck, indeed, do they seem to have been, that we read of no man that "answered him a word;" and that his parable was emphatic as well as ingenious, the mutual "fire" with which Abimelech and his wicked associates vexed and consumed each other, in due time testified.

How soon did the "evil spirit" between these confederates in wickedness break out?

MARY. "When Abimelech had reigned three years in Israel, the men of Shechem dealt treacherously with him."

MAMA. And in requital of what crime was this permitted?

MARY. Oh! the murder of his three score brethren.

MAMA. And was this to be avenged on Abimelech alone?

MARY. No, no; on the men of Shechem which "aided him,"

Mama. Yes, and whose treachery, after ruining Abimelech, was to be finally turned against themselves. Oh! Mary, how strong is that voice of God within the breast of even fallen creatures, which prompts the youngest to exult, when, even in this world, His justice is vindicated, and the wicked taken in their own net!" And if uce thus feel (even while in this imperfect state), as if personally concerned in the punishment of transgressors like oursely s, can we for a moment listen to those who would represent the final punishment of all wickedness as not only unworthy of, but repugnant to, God! So far from this, it will be one of the most awful features of the day of judgment, that the wicked themselves must acquiesce in the justice of their own condemnation.

It would be too tedious and unprofitable to follow Abinnelech, and his late friends, through the sickening details of their mutual treachery. How did each try, in turn, to destroy the other?

MARY. By "lying in wait," like cowardly deceitful creatures. But Abimelech got the better at first!

Mama. And what cruel revenge, of a piece with his former conduct, did he take on the city and men of Shechem, his "bone and his flesh," as he lately called them?

MARY. He slew all the people, and beat down the city, and sowed it with salt." What was that for?

MAMA. As a mark of savage triumph, and of a wish, at least, to consign the spot (the birth-place, be it remembered, of his mother and her family) to hopeless desolation. In so doing, Abimelech perverted to the gratification of private revenge, a mark of reprobation ordered by God to be set on the site of idolatrons cities, and on the dwellings of parricidal rebellious sons, such as his own act had just proved himself to be. But what farther barbarities did he practise on the garrison of the citadel, or "tower" of Shechem?

MARY. Oh! he burnt them cruelly, and women among them too-about a thousand altogether.

MAMA. And where had these unfortunate people taken refuge?

MARY. "In an hold of the house of the God Berith." So he burnt the temple of the very false God he pretended to worship! What a wicked wretch!

MAMA. But see with what prompt and strict retribution vengeance was dealt out to him, by means of another imprisoned and desperate garrison, and by the hand of one of the sex he had so ruthlessly suffered to perish. What happened when he was in the act of placing once more his MARY. "A woman cast a piece of a millstone upon his head, and almost broke his skull;" and that she might not say she had killed him, he got his armour-bearer to "thrust him through." It was too good a death for him!

MAMA. A sufficient proof, however, of that just vengeance of God for his unnatural cruelty, with which the chapter so properly closes; while the in olvement in the same fate of his guilty abettors, shews that though for a time "hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished."

We must cast a hasty glance over the successive "defenders," whom God, in our next chapter, "raised up" for guilty Israel. Of Tola the first we hear nothing, nor of the enemies from whom he proved a deliverer. How long did his reign endure?

MARY. "He judged Israel twenty-three years, and died, and was buried in Shamir."

MAMA. How few are there, Mary, among either the judges or subsequent kings of Israel, of whom it would not have been well had as little been recorded as of this servant of God, known to us only by name! Of him alone, and his immediate successor Jair, are there no disgraceful weaknesses, or open transgressions, to be set against a few chequered testimonies of zeal for God, and devotion to his service! One negative merit must at least have certainly been theirs'; for it was not till they were removed, that the children of Israel once more "did evil in the sight of the Lord," after forty-five years of apparent abstinence from idolatry—due, in all probability, to the influence of these two worthy men.

MARY. And now they did make up for it by worshipping, not Baal only, but all the false gods they could hear of round about!—" The gods of Syria, and the gods of Moab, and the gods of Ammon, and the gods of the Philistines." Mama, they were too bad!

MAMA. Yes, for you and I, Mary; but not for Him who alone is entitled to judge of the extent of his own forbearance. But indeed even His "anger" was now "hot against Israel;" and whom did He make its appropriate instruments?

MARY. Oh! the very people whose gods they borrowed so meanly; the Philistines, and the children of Ammon.

MAMA. And how long did this merited chastisement continue?

MARY. "They vexed and oppressed the children of Israel eighteen years;" and when they cried at last to God, I am half glad he did not save them immediately; for I am sure it was for their good to be put off, and reminded of their perpetual rebellions. I can't be wrong now, Mama, for even God said he would deliver them no more, and bade them go and cry to the gods they had chosen.

MAMA. Yes, my dear; but let us take care lest what in the mouth of Jehovah was but legitimate reproof and correction, degenerates in our's into unchristian bitterness. Till we have been placed in the same circumstances of exposure to idolatry as the Israelites, we can never be entitled to provenue their doom; and in so doing (while sinners, as we all are, against clearer and more irresistible convictions), can we ever be sure we are not unwittingly, like David to Nathan, condemning ourselves. The Israelites, as a nation, for sook God every twenty or thirty years. Is there one year, or even day, of our lives, during which, as individuals, we can say we have faithfully and conscientiously "cleaved" to Him? Ask yourself this before you are "glad" to see your fellow creatures repulsed from the footstool of their ofended Judge; and blush still more for the avowal of this vindictive feeling, when you read of the very opposite emotion ascribed here to your God. viz. that his "soul was grieved" for the misery of the children of Israel.

MARY. I am quite sorry, Mama, that I spoke so harshly; but the Israelites are so provoking!

MAMA. Call to your aid, then, the "charity which is not easily provoked," and remember who it is that hath said "Judge not, that ye be not judged." I should like to bring the case home a little to your own country and feelings. Suppose some thousand years hence, a historian should describe you and me (and justly) as belonging to a nation, distinguished beyond all others by Godfavoured with innumerable advantages of soil, climate, and situation-protected from aggressionshielded from the miseries of war-blessed with the most equal government, and purest form of religion which have ever prevailed in any land. Could be go on to say that these unexampled blessings were in any measure deserved or requited by national holiness, gratitude, and devotion to God? that all, or any large portion of us, was a whit better, than if such favours had been withheld, and such signal advantages denied us? Alas! Mary, when the irreligion, ingratitude, and depravity of our country shall at length have cast it down from the proud pre-eminence which, as a people favoured by God, it had long maintained, how would you shudder to hear the expression of "rejoicing" over even this merited catastrophe from the lips of exulting foes!

We know not how soon Britain may, in her turn, be abandoned to her idols of wealth, and power, and expediency. But, in the mean time, let us, while acknowledging with trembling consciousness, our utter incapacity of "doing justly," at least "love mercy, and walk humbly before our God."

MORNING TWELFTH.

Lesson-Judges, Chapters xi. and xir.

MAMA. Our last reading terminated with the expressions of unusually sincere penitence (accompanied with their only legitimate fruit, the suppression of idolatry) on the part of the children of Israel; and with that deeply affecting figure of human speech, by which the "sonl" of Jehovah was said to "be grieved" for their "misery." From the yoke of what warlike and long victorions nation was deliverance now about to be granted by Him, to the prayers and tein of his people?

MARY. The children of Ammon. You know they had vexed and oppressed them for eighteen years; and at the end of our last chapter, they were gathered together and encamped at Gilead. And the Israelites were assembled against them too; only they wanted a leader, and said, whoever would begin to fight should be "head" over all the inhabitants of Gilead.

MAMA. And by what countryman of their own was the tempting recompense earned?

Many. By Jephthah the Gileadite, who, it says, was "a mighty man of valour;" but his brothers thrust thim out, because he was the "son of a stronge woman."

MARCO. Yes, like Abimelech, of one of those inferior wives of whom we lately spoke; whose toleration, by the customs of the Jews, proved a fertile source of family discord and fraternal hatred. Income "strange woman" here, is moreover thought to imply that the mother of Jephthah was of a different nation, and on that account her son would be an object of double contempt and suspicion; though not necessarily excluded by the circumstance from a share in his father's inheritance. By whom do we find him also (like Abimelech) surrounded in his exile?

Many Vain men were gathered to him, and went out with him."

MAMA. Surely may we say, "God's ways are not as our ways," when the proscribed son of an alien mother, attended by a few lawless companions, is made the instrument of deliverance to a whole people; and, as a prelude to this, an object abject supplications to the very countrymen by whom he had been spurned and expelled! Did Jepthali at first give implicit credence to their assurances (extorted by distress) that he should be their "head?"

Mary. No, Mama, he could hardly believe in such an honour. But I think he must have deserved it, for he says at the very first, "If the Lord deliver the children of Israel before me;" and when they made the agreement, he "uttered all his words before the Lord."

Mama. And do you not think this then unusual, and, under the circumstances, wonderful piety, in the "son of a strange woman," must have marked him out, far more than his being a " mighty man of valour," as a fit agent in the plans of providence for the deliverance of Israel? Had this piety been (as we shall soon find was not the case) under the guidance of equal discretion, the character of Jephthah would have come down to us unstained by its greatest blot. But, in the mean time, nothing can be more to merate or reasonable than his answer to the exposting tions of the bitter enemies, whom, had his rashness becay universal, he would have rushed on, without discussion on the goodness of their cause. We trace his piety also, in the motive he assigns for retaining the country alleged to have been taken from Ammon by his forefathers, on their way from Egypt, viz. that because "the Lord God had dispossessed the Ammonites from before Israel, therefore should they possess their land." For what reason had this dispossession been permitted, when the boundaries of Edom and Moab were religiously respected, by the express command of God?

MANY. Oh! you told me long since, and it is mentioned again here, that Israel never would have meddled with Lot or Esau's children in any way, if the ungrateful cross Ammonites had not refused their civit request to pass through their country, at I chose to fight against them, and lost it. So they had no right to want it back again so long after. But surely Jephthah did not think Chemosh, the god of the Ammonites, really gave them any thing, as God gave the children of Israel?

MAMA. No, he only addressed them as heathens, jealous for the honour of their gods of wood and stone; and contrasted with these the superior inviolability of the gifts of Jehovah. This is proved, by his invoking, as sole judge of the whole ontroversy, the one true God. But on the idolatrous Ammonites the solemn appeal, as might be expected, had no effect. How was Jephthah now expressly consecrated to his high office?

MARY. The spirit of the Lord came upon him.

Mama! if this was the case, why did it let him make the rash yow he was so soon to repent of?

MAMA. I am glad you have asked the question, because nothing is more necessary in reading scripture history, than to discriminate between the inspired and uninspired actions of its eminent characters. If the Divine Spirit with which Jephthah was invested, as Captain of the Lord's host against his enemies, had enabled him to foresee the consequences of his vow, he would have been (which we nowhere read of) a prophet; and if it had entirely overruled or superseded his naturally enthusiastic disposition, he would have ceased to be a man. Is it not far more for our instruction, that, instead of such supernatural controul as would have converted into mere machines the human beings designed for our example and warning, they are left (except as regards their immediate commission) "men of like passions" with ourselves; capable, in short, like Jephthah, of carrying to excess even the most laudable emotions of which our nature is susceptible? But in why did the indiscretion of Jephthah's vow consist? Was it not both natural and praiseworthy to promise a thank. offering to the Lord, in case of victory achieved by His power?

MARY. Oh! yes, Mama; but it was very rash to say he would offer for a burnt-offering whatever came first out of the door of his house. Why it could only be his daughter or one of the family!

MAMA. True, if we limit the expression to the actual "house," instead of rather extending it to those "gates," within which we find, in Scripture, all the possessions of a wealthy Jew comprised.

MARY. How shocked he must have been when he saw his only child come to meet him with timbrels and dances! Mama, I don't think, except the offering up of Laac, (and he, you know, was not killed after all), there is any story in the Bible so member by as Jephthah sacrificing his daughter. And such a sweet dutiful resigned creature too! just like Isaac, and more so, for she had a long time to think of her sad fate. Surely God could never be pleased with any thing so unnatural!

MAMA. Certainly not; for of all the enormities of the heathen, human sacrifices, and especially "making their sons and daughters to pass through the fire were denounced by Him with the utmost abhorence. Now, as this latter "abomination unto the Lord" would have actually taken place, had the innocent daughter of Jephthah been made a literal "burnt-offering,"—let us try what ground there is for the nearly divided weight of opinion which would have us regard the sacrifice as only figurative; and involving no more than the perpetual seclusion from the world and mankind, of the devoted victim, like the nuns of modern times in catholic countries.

MARY. I should be quite glad to think this was all; but why would her father have been so sorry?

Mama. Because, in addition to the loss of his only child's society, he thereby cut her off from all hope of being the mother of the promised "seed," a privilege so highly prized by the daughters of Israel. But we must not run away with this pleasing conclusion—against which the general belief of the Jews themselves is said to tend; while it certainly has in its favour the utter unlawfulness of human sacrifices, and improbability of Jephthah's thus imagining to propitiate the true God; as well as various expressions in the history itself, which seem inconsistent with the idea of actual immolation.

These, for your comfort, I will mention to you, as discovered and applied by learned men. First, then, in the original verse where Joshüa, ys, that whatever came forth to meet him should be the Lord's, "and" he would offer it for a burnt-offering—the margin of the Bible gives "or" as the true reading; from which it has been inferred that an animal only was intended to be sacrificed, while a human being would be dedicated (like Samuel) to the Lord. Another more conclusive fact is, that it was her celibacy, and not death, which formed the subject of the victim and her companion's lamentations; and the third and strongest of all, is found in the circumstance, that where it is said the "daughters of Israel went four days in every year to lament for "the daughter of Jephthah," to " talk with" or " carry presents to," is supposed to convey more truly the sense of the original Hebrew. Two things only are plain in this much controverted history. First, that God, who punished with death here, and has threatened with "Tophet' (or hell-fire) bereafter, all parents capable of calming their hands in the blood of their children, could neither have accepted in this case the sacrifice or "person" of Jephthah; even had the authority of the latter, as "head over Gilead," enabled him to take the life of his innocent child, without that sanction of the elders and consent of all the people, which were necessary for the condemnation of the rebellious and incorrigible. And, secondly, that viewed even in the most favourable light, " rashness of Jephthah affords a warning in first all unlawful tampering in finite creatures with the course of future events; especially when the happiness and interests of others may be involved. Jephthah had as little the right, as he doubtless had the inclination, to doom his daughter to barrenness, and his own health to desolation; and in this even mitigated calamity his presumptuous yow no doubt found its sufficient punishment.

Let us notice, however, with its due commendation, the resigned and dutiful spirit displayed by her, who, "forasmuch as her father had opened his mouth unto the Lord, and the Lord had taken vengeance" through him of the enemies of his country—was content—(if not indeed to perish in the bloom of her days)-to wander a disconsolate recluse on the mountains, far from home and kindred, and cut off from the sweetest sympathies and dearest hopes of woman! Of this it may at least be said, (as was predicted of another act of yet higher duty exercised towards our blessed Lord), that wherever the word of God is read " there shall this which she hath done, be told for a memorial of her;" and an example to the remotest days, of amiable submission to even the most unwarrantable stretch of parental authority.

But we must pass on to the laggryears of Jephthah, the brief remainder of which with probably embittered, if not actually shortened, by morse for the past. By whom was his peaceful possession of supreme power very early questioned and disturbed?

Mary. By the men of Ephraim. They must have been quarrelsome people, for they envise and abused Gideon, and now they were angry with Jephthah for conquering without them. A he says. Why did they not help him when he really required it, instead of finding fault now? But he need not have gone to war about it, and killed forty-two thousand men, and his own countrymen too!

MAMA. A lamentable instance of what has often been remarked, viz. that conflicts between brothren exceed all others in mutual ferocity. This was, like too many, a contest about words, (for the Fphraimites had spoken disparagingly of the Gilea ites as fugitives); and by a word was it cruelly visited, and upon fugitives also, when the Ephraimites had, in their turn, become such. What test did the vindictive Gileadites fall on to discover their flying brothren?

MARY. To see if they could say "Shibboleth" properly. Why was that word chosen?

MAMA. Because (as signifying "floods of water") it shill naturally be used by such as requested a passage across the rigidly guarded "swellings of Jordan."

MARY. And why, I wonder, could the poor Ephraimites not say it like the others?

Mama. No one, Mary, who has heard (like yourself) the various dialects prevailing in England, Scotland, and Ireland, nay, even in separate counties of each, need be astonished that tribes living on opposite sides of a river boundary should use a different pronunciation. Have you forgotten how Peter was recognised for a "Galilean" by the High Priest's servant?

MARY. Oh! no—"his speech bewrayed him." MAMA. Well! "the Galilee beyond Jordan," whose language he spoke, was separated from Jerusalem by precisely the same distance and natural boundaries, which severed a few centuries earlier the position and dialect of Gilead and Ephraim. So immutable and permanent are natural distinctions and dissimilarities among men!

How long did Jephthah survive this unwarrantable act of severity towards his brethren?

MARY. Not long, I suppose, for he only judged Israel six years; while most of the former judges reigned twenty or thirty. And those that came after, had short reigns too; but they had prodigious families—one thirty and another forty sons! I suppose they must all have be a judges or great men, as well as their father.

Mama. What leads you to infer this?

MARY. Because they "rode on forty asscolts," and I know now that this was a mark of honour reserved for kings and great people.

MAMA. Had many known, or chosen to know it—the profane scoffing, of which a similar incident in the New Testament has been made the subject, would not have redounded (as all such light jests do) to the shame of their ignorant and senseless anthors. And while thus finding, even in the veriest trifles recorded in Holy Writ, as well as in the narratives of modern travellers, hourly confirmation of its more important features—we may defy the whole host of cavillers and sceptics to quote from either one circumstance, calculated to throw the slightest portion of doubt or discredit on the word of "Him who cannot lie," or the dictates of "Him who cannot err."

MORNING THIRTEENTIL

LESSON-Judges, Chapters xiii. and xiv.

MAMA. The life of the famous individual, of whose birth and early history we have this day been reading, calls, in a peculiar manner, for that distinction between the inspired and uninspired actions of God's chosen instruments, to which we alluded in the cases of Gideon and Jephthah; and for want of attention to which this whole book of Judges has been perverted to suit the purposes of scoffers and infidels. From the occational weakness, nay, even criminality, of those, who, their selection to be the champions of Israel never pa fessed to raise above the failings of humanityfools have not hesitated either to make " God the author of sin," by attributing directly to Him the imperfections of his fallible agents; or, if their impiety could not carry them thus far, to get out of the difficulty by denying the inspiration or authenticity of Scripture. There is no subject which it is more important to put on its only true or reptural foundation; so as to show to its simplest a ders the futility and inconsistency of expectation veachsafed to the most favoured individuals under be Old Testament, an exemption from sins and passions, which the whole ample discoveries of the New, aided by the bright example of perfection affor led by the human character of our Lord, have never sufficed to produce. Those who only draw from the cransgressions of Gideon, of Samson, or of David, matter for arraigning either the wisdom or truth of the Most High, would do well to try, by even that avowedly imperfect standard, their own far scantier measure of piety, of obedience, of faith, of devotion to, and confidence in God.

This being premised and kept in view, the Christian is at full liberty to deduce, from the failings recorded professedly for his instruction, the warrings which similar faults in persons less highly distinguished could never have so solemuly harforced.

At what period of deep distress and oppression among his countrymen was the birth of Samson promised?

MARY. When they had been delivered, for ordoing evil again in the sight of the Lord," forty years into the hands of the Philistines. Who were they?

MAMA. A maritime people, occupying the sea coasts of Canaan; and though not one of the nations expressly devoted by the curse of God to destruction, yet idolaters, and, as such, interdicted from association with the Israelites; a prohibition which we shall soon see, even in the case of the dedicated Samson, to have been frequently and fatally infringed. To what tribe did his father Manoah belong?

MARY. He was of the Danites.

MAMA. Yes: and the Jews themselves are fond of considering what was prophesied by Jacob of the victories to be achieved by the "cunuing and craft of Dan," as fulfilled in the history of this his most remarkable descendant. In what terms was his birth divinely announced to the barren and desponding wife of Manoah?

MARY. It only says he should "begin to deliver Israel out of the hand of the "12" stines." I thought he had done it altogether before he "ed.

MAMA. Nay, Mary; his being in captivity to them at that very period, and the limited slaughter his last efforts caused of the inmates of a single building, sufficiently corroborate the exact truth of the prediction. The Philistines continued, in spite of the various ways in which Samson was enabled to harass and distress them, a powerful people so late as the days of Saul. By what singular consecration was the son of Manoah, even before his birth, devoted to the office of performing God's "strange work" upon his enemies?

May. He was to be a "Nazarite to God from the womb." Were refraining from wine, and usclean God, and not cutting the hair, the only things that made Nazarites differ from other people?

"M... Nay: these outward observances were only intended as symbols of inward purity and dedication to God's service. Similar vows were very common among the Jews, either for life (as in the case of Samson), or for a limited period. Nor does the pure light of Christianity seem to have immediately superseded them. Do you recollect any eminent Christian who, in fulfilment of just such an engagement, did the exact reverse of one of the things here enumerated as the outward masks of a Nazarite?

MARY. Let me think: oh! I remember; when learning my daily verse in the Acts lately, I wondered why Paul should have "shorn his head in Cenchrea for a vow," and meant to ask you to explain it to me. Why did he do it?

Mama. Probably as one of the harmless, though superfluous, compliances with Jewish customs, to which he, who, for the Gospel's sake, became "all things to all men," sometimes condescended. But we must return to the praiseworthy faith and piety of Manoah: Did he for a moment question the reality of the divine revelation made to his wife?

MARY. Oh, no! on the contrary, he begged the angel might come back to teach them " what to do to the child that should be born." Mama, this man and his wife were better people than Abraham and Sarah.

MAMA. In this instance, certainly, their faith (under far greater disadvantages), was both more implicit and wonderful; though this book, as well as the whole experience afforded by Scripture of human nature, shows us the error that would arise from estimating characters by individual acts, either of vice or virtue. But the solicitude of Manoah for the suitable education of the offspring to be sent by God, is still more rare and commendable. With what remarkable additions were the former directions of the angel repeated?

MARY. The mother herself was to be a Nazarite too, and to beware of all the things that were forbidden to the child.

MAMA. A mysterious command, Mary; but one from which parents among ourselves may derive deep instruction. "Can a clean thing come out of an unclean?" is the searching question of Scripture to every irreligious or careless parent; and of mothers especially, it may be said, that if the fountain whence a child's first impressions and ideas are universally derived, be polluted, the merciful provision made by God for its growth in grace and virtue is as cruelly and fatally frustrated, as if (with a cruelty all would shrink from) she fed it from the cradle with poisoned or insufficient food!

Ites did Manoah seek to testify his gratitude to this bearer of "glad tidings of great joy?"

MARY. He wished to detain the angel, and, like Gideon, he surely took him for a man, as he offered to "make ready a kid for him." But his wife knew better: from the first she thought him "like an angel."

MAMA. And whom do you suppose the "augel" here spoken of to have been?

Mar 1 should have thought at once it was the st himself; but then he does not say "Offer your burnt-offering to me," but "Offer it to the Lord;" and this looks as if the speaker was only an angel.

MAMA. I am glad you have observed a slight difficulty, arising only from difference of idiom between the English and Hebrew. But there is one word, the more exact translation of which in the margin of the Bible, proves at once the divinity of the heavenly visitor. What was his answer, when, with dutiful reverence, Manoah inquired his name?

MARY. It seems rather a strange one. He says, "Why askest thou after my name, seeing it is secret?" That is surely the very reason for wishing to know any thing.

MAMA. Yes, Mary; but we are told the proper translation of the word "secret" here, should be "wonderful;" and to whom, alone. have you heard it as a "name" applied?

MARY. To our Lord, Mama. You know "His name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor," &c.

MAMA. Very well remembered. And how did the Son of God, on this occasion, vindicate his claim to the stupendous title?

Many. By "doing wonderously;" for while Manoah and his wife were offering their sacrifice, He ascended to heaven in the flame of altar. No wonder they both "fell on their faces to ground" when they saw it; but how much more sensibly the wife behaved than her cowardly husband!

MAMA. Yes: she appears, from her sound and masculine understanding, and strong faith, to have been a suitable parent for the prodigy of strength and occasional trust in God whom it was her lot to bring into the world.

MARY. It says, "the Spirit of God began to move Samson at times." I suppose it was then only that he behaved well.

Mama. I fear you have not attended sufficiently to what I said lately on the subject of the particular sort of "inspiration" mentioned in this book; else you would have known that it had nothing to do with vice or virtue, but only implied power from God to perform acts of signal or supermount. Every part of the history of Samson puts thus in the clearest light. What was the first decisive proof that his ordinary actions were by no means under spiritual direction?

MARY. Oh, foolish Samson! He chose a wife from among the wicked Philistines! No wonder it vexed his good father and mother. How could they think it was "of the Lord?"

MAMA. Just from adverting (which you do not,) to '22' design of God, to make Samson a "swar" and a "scourge" to His enemies. In Latherance of this object, these pious people were even content to bow to the wayward will of their gifted son. By what uncommon instance of strength must his own faith in his miraculous mission have been confirmed?

MARY. By his "rending a young lion as if it had been a kid."

MAMA. And with what singular inhabitants did be find the carcass of the lion be had slain, some time afterwards peopled?

MARY. A swarm of bees; and they had made honey there! Mama, this was surely a miracle too! and the honey could not be good; for I read lately, that bees so hate the smell of carrion, that if a mouse dies in the hive, and is too big to be carried out, they plaster the body over with some sort of mortar, to keep it fresh.

MAMA. I am always glad to hear you apply your little stock of general knowledge to the elucidation of Scripture. But as it was "after a time," sufficient both for the courtship of Samson at Tinnath, and some stay at home, that he subsequently returned to carry back his wife, and, as in those hot countries a very few days would have reduced to a dry scentless framework of bones the skeleton of the lion, there is nothing in the choice of it by the bees for a sheave, inconsistent with your knowledge of the fast-lious habits of those curious little creatures. Travellet tell us that their natural hives are as various as the countries they inhabit: and to a fallen and hollow tree, one of their most favourite resorts, the prostrate carcass of the lion may have borne some resemblance.

MARY. Mama, I should have thought the riddle of Samson, to puzzle the guests at his wedding-feast, as childish as Jotham's fable of the bramble, only you told use such things were common in those days.

MAMA. Yes, and in those countries even to the days we live in. The Greeks, a far more polished people than either the Jews or Philistines, made great use of eugmas in their entertainments, to sharpen and exercise the wit of the guests. But the riddle of Samson had a deeper are known malicious object.

MARY. Yes, and a more greedy one; to win clothes from his companions; for he knew it was impossible they should ever find it out.

MAMA. Except by the method they took, of first intimidating his wife, and then, by her means, extorting the secret from him. You see here the disastrous consequences of an unhallowed alliance! domestic discord and treachery, defeat and disgrace 'a' the champion of Israel, the innocent slagified to discharge an iniquitous gambling debt, and the heathen wife, in whom the parents of Samson had truly seen a "firebrand" between the camps of Philistia and of Israel, ignominiously taken from the man she had betrayed, and given to his "own familiar friend!" Yet all this mass of sin and misery was God pleased to overrule, as he ever does, the "unruly wills and affections of sinful men," to the furtherance of His own designs, and the promotion of his honour "upon his enemies."

MARY. I am quite glad you told me the "Spirit of the Lord" coming on Samson only meant his being made strong, for I don't think it could be right in him to kill thirty people (even Philistines,) to pay his wager with their clothes.

MAMA. Certainly not; and bitterly was visited on Samson, even in this world, that treacherous exasperation of Philistine enmity which his own fierce temper was allowed, for God's purposes, to stir up between natious intended by Him to be hostile. Whoever can presume to make Jehovah responsible, for either the ferocious passions or idle caprices of Samson, must overlook His dreadful personal chastisements of that erring, though not altogether forsaken servant; humiliation, blindness, insult, and captivity, terminating in a violent and self-inflicted death!

MORNING FOURTEENTH.

Lesson-Judges, Chapters xv. and xvi.

Mi AA. Our last reading, my dear Mary, closed with a review of the temporal evils and mischiefs resulting from the first unhallowed alliance of Samson; and an anticipation of the disastrous consequences to himself (however overruled by God for His own higher purposes,) which arose from his perseverance in similar connexions. How did he idly seek to renew ties, which the treachery of his wife and her friends, and his own violence, one woy'd have thought, had for ever severed?

Mary. He went to visit her with a kid. That was an odd present to make!

Mama. By no means an uncommon one, in Holy Writ, on similar occasions, and esteemed to this day a great delicacy in the East. But we find it and its donor, alike repulsed by the incensed father of her whose countrymen had already paid so dearly for her indiscretion. How were they made to suffer yet more severely for this new insult. by Samson?

MARY. In a very strange way! by putting firebrands to the tails of foxes, and driving them into the corn fields. Surely no one but himself could ever have dreamt of any thing so mischieyous!

On the contrary, we learn from hea-MAMA. then authors that the device was by no means unexampled among the ancients; and a custom is mentioned by the Reman poet Ovid, of turning out, once a year, foxes into the circus with burning torches on their backs, which some of the learned have construed into a commemoration of the exploit of Samson. But as readers less favourably disposed, have drawn inferences derogatory to the credit of Scripture, from the usual scarcity and shyness of foxes, which would render it difficult to collect and catch so many as 300-it is as well you should know that the word here signifies Jackals; an animal abundant all ever the East, and whose habits of assembling in Range flocks, and fearlessly entering gardens, and even villages, would admirably adapt them to the destructive purpose of Samson, and will account for their carrying devastation even into the "vineyards and olives." But mark the retribution which, even in this world, overtook the treachery and perjury of his Philistine wife and her father. Their enraged countrymen, justly attributing to these fertile sources of evil the public calamity, visited its authors with the corresponding penalty of "fire."

Did this summary catastrophe, over which a man of milder nature would have relented, disarm the vengeauce of Samson?

Mary. Oh! no; he said, "Though ye have done this, yet will I be avenged of you."

MANA. And whose designs against His enemies 3d inis indulgence of private enmity signally promote?

MARY. The Lord's; or else Samson would never have been allowed to "smite them with a great slaughter."

MAMA. True; but were the gracious designs of God, in thus harassing their enemies, duly appreciated and seconded by the oppressed children of Israel?

MARY. No; for when the Philistines came up intwoudah to try and take Samson, his cowardly countrymen wanted to bind him, and give him up to them. They did not deserve to have such a champion!

Mama. And how were their unpatriotic designs frustrated?

MARY. By "the Spirit of the Lord coming mightily upon Samson," and his breaking like flax the two new cords with which the men of Judah had bound him. I wonder, considering his temper, he did not kill them first.

MAMA. That would indeed have been to misuse the supernatural strength bestowed on him for a different purpose! What did it now enable him to achieve?

MARY. To slay a thousand men with the jawbone of an ass. This was certainly a miracle, Mama; was it not?

Mama. Yes, perfectly miraculous; yet not more so than all the corresponding parts of Samson's history; and it is the apparently ignoble weapon alone, which has exposed the circumstance to more of profane incredulity than those of carrying off the iron gates of Gaza, or burying in its ruins the proud temple of Dagon. To the miracle itself, we have the attestation afforded by the name of "Lehi" (signifying a jaw-bone), which adhered to the spot for ages after; and modern travellers say, that there is yet to be seen there a fountain called the "Fountain of the Jaw," supposed to have been the one here mentioned as springing miraculously, not from the bone itself (as our translation would seem to express), but from the spot thus named by Samson on casting it away. This last interpretation removes one of the cavils (idle indeed, and unimportant) against the miracle; while it is pleasing to think that a traditional memorial should, as in the similar case of the smitten rock of Moses, remain to bear witness to the power of the Most High. That it subsisted at the time the book of Judges was written, is expressly mentioned in the 19th verse, where it is stated, that the "well of him that called, or cried" (which "Enhakkore" signifies), was "in Lehi" to that day.

How long after this event did Samson continue, a necested, it would appear, by the Philistines, to judge Israel?

Many. Twenty years. What a pity he should, at the end of that time, when he was so much older and wiser, fall again into the snares of wicked Philistine women!

MAMA. This was but a natural punishment of his breach of God's command against intercourse with idolaters, which, as a lawgiver, he was bound to have enforced. How did the men of Gaza take advantage of his sinful weakness?

MARY. They thought they had him secure by locking the gates of their town; but he carried them, posts, and bar, and all, to the top of the hill before Hebron. How far was that?

Mama. Hebron itself was twenty miles from Gaza; but the hill, which was on the road, might not have exceeded half that distance.

MARY. I wonder God gave him strength to escape! He had no business to be in a Philistine town at all.

MAMA. If Samson's person or merits had had any share in God's design of enabling him as His instrument to humble the Philistines, your wonder might be excused; though even in this point of view, His justice was soon vindicated by the deeper fall into guilt and misery in which present impunity involved Samson. So far from being inclined to arraign (as some have presumptuously done) the perfections of the Most High, from his supposed favour to so faulty a character, I do not know that all Scripture affords a more impressive example of temporal chastisement uniformly ensuing on that "sin" whose "wages" were, in this case, not only intolerable captivity, but a violent death.

Did the narrow escape of Samson from Gaza wean his foolish heart from those toils of the "strange woman," the road to whose house is emphatically called by Solomon, "the way to hell?"

MARY. Oh! no; Delilah was the worst of all, for she was ready to sell his life for eleven hundred pieces of silver. Mama, surely Samson was infatuated to tell her the truth at last; for each time he put her off with pretences, she brought his enemies to take him. How could he be so silly as to let out his secret to such a creature?

Mama. Not more so than thousands, Mary, who surrender to mercenary beings, equally bent on their ruin, not liberty or temporal life alone, but the principles and hopes of an immortal soul. Samson seems from the first to have had misgivings of Delilah's treachery, which, indeed, she took little pains to disguise; but far, far indeed is his from being the first or last sinful attachment strong enough to overcome even the instinct of sel: reservation implanted in man by his merciful Creator. It is evident that rather than lose a woman, for whom it was impossible he could feel the slightest esteem or confidence, Samson was content to hazard his own life, and incur an infamous breach of his covenant with God: but it is equally evident, that, like many offenders of later times, frequent deliverances had hardened his heart, and prevented him from giving entire credit to his own words, that, if shorn of his mysterious locks, he should be weak as another man. This is plain from his saying, on awaking a prisoner from his last fatal slumber, "I will go out, as at other times, and shake myself; for he wist not that the Lord had departed from him." How grievous must have been his reflections when, a blinded and over-wrought captive, he "did grind," like a beast of burden, in the prison-house of his once despised foes!

MARY. Was it corn he ground, Mama? I thought, in the Bible times, that was women's work.

Mama. Female slaves were certainly often employed in it, but so were malefactors; and it was a task by which the humiliation of their sightless prisoner was, in the opinion of the proud Philistines, completed. But did God forget him in the "house of his bondage?" or rather have we not reason to believe he thence cried unto the Lord?

MARY. I don't know, Mama, unless the growing of his hair was a sign that God had not quite forsaken him, and that his strength would come back by degrees.

MAMA. You cannot suppose, Mary, that (except as a symbol or token of adherence to a Divine covenant) the hair of Samson had any thing to do with his supernatural strength. But as the re-appearance of this forfeited mark of allegiance would awaken in the breast of the humbled captive those hopes of forgiveness, from which experience proves that true repentance is most apt to arise, we may hope that it was in gracious acceptance of some such penitent feelings, that the last request of the sightless servant of God was granted. On what occasion of brutal triumph was it made?

MARY. The savage Philistines met to rejoice over Samson, and offer a sacrifice to Dagon their God; and they said it was he who had delivered their enemy into their hands. I dare say God would have punished them for this, even though Samson had not repented.

MAMA. Very probably; but as the vengeance (or at least his share in it) is represented in Scripture as the immediate effect of the prayer of Samson to God, we have no right to deny His erring servant the benefit of the charitable view which all Divines have taken of his penitence in affliction. For what very opposite and cruel purpose was he brought forth at the idolatrons festival?

MARY. "To make sport" for the people. How could be do that?

Mama. Probably by exhibiting (at the command of his insulting taskmasters) some of those feats of returning strength, of which they were ere long to witness so awful a proof. Are you aware of that peculiar construction of many of the eastern temples and public buildings, which would involve (supposing the central pillars shaken) the spectators of a festival in the utter destruction here mentioned?

MARY. I know the roofs were flat. Did people stand upon them to see any thing?

Mama. Yes—to witness the games, feats of wrestling, &c. frequently exhibited in the central area, round which a row of cloisters generally extended; the roofs of which, depending for support on the main pillars of the edifice, would, when these were thrown down, necessarily fall with them. How many people are said to have been "on" this "roof" (besides those who filled the temple itself) "beholding" while Samson "made sport" in the central arena?

Mary. Three thousand men and women. What a number to perish by one man!

Mama. Or rather by the delegated power of God, working in a single individual. It is indeed a remarkable feature in the history of Samson, that while other champions of Israel were commissioned to act chiefly as leaders of their brethren, all the exploits of Samson were performed without human co-operation; thus making them more palpably "of the Lord," while they had for their evident object, rather the humiliation of His enemies, than any permanent or extensive deliverance to His people.

This was peculiarly the case in the last signal exertion of Samson's supernatural power. Its occurrence in an idolatrous temple, among a heathen nation, at the precise moment when its chief blasphemers were assembled to ascribe unto their idol, the honour which belongeth to Jehovah alone, and their involvement in one sudden and fearful ruin, in which massisted man could claim "neither part nor lot," would abundantly attest to Jew and Gentile, the truth too often forgotten by both, that the "Lord is King, let the heathen rage never so furiously."

What instruction may Christians chiefly derive from the chequered history of Samson, and its vixed page of sin and suffering, of penitence and final triumph?

MARY. It has made me understand better that the great men of the Bible were not meant to be patterns of goodness, because if they had, they could not have been like us, and we should not have been made wiser by their faults. Surely no one who reads about Samson could ever put faith again in wicked women, or lose God's favour to please them; when all he got for it was being made a prisoner, and blind, and wretched! and when, though he did repent, and got leave to kill his enemies, that did not save him from dying miserably with them!

MAMA. Would that every reader, my dear Mary, drew from this much abused history, inferences as simple and salutary as your own; viewing in its erring hero a beacon set up by Eternal Truth, to warn succeeding generations that, apart from God and His sauctifying influences, the "race is not" here below "to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, nor wisdom" even to men of the acutest natural "understanding."

MORNING FIFTEENTH.

Lesson-Judges, Chapters xvii. and xviii.

A: MA. We have in these two memorable chapters, perhaps as striking an example as any in Scripture of the rapid propagation of evil; of the easy transition from private to national corruption of true religion: and of the awful responsibility which may be incurred by individual alienation from, or even perversion of, the worship of God. The transaction, it must be premised, occurred at a period considerably earlier than that of which we have latterly been reading; before the establishment of regular Judges over all Israel, and while the yet unsettled tribes, under their own respective heads, did (as is said in verse 6th) "every man what was right in his own eyes."

Of what tribe was the man whose domestic idolatry proved (in the words of Scripture) "how great a matter a little fire kindleth?"

MARY. He was a man of mount Ephraim.

MAMA. And do you recollect to what lengths of apostasy that guilty tribe ultimately proceeded. or in what solemn terms it was denounced by Him who had long fruitlessly said, "Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die?"

Mary. I do remember it, it was so awful. "Ephraim is joined to his idols—let him alone."

MAMA. Words indeed hardly to be forgotten, when pronounced of any of us helpless human creatures, whom the restraining hand of grace alone can save from "going down alive into the pit."

By what act of filial impiety was Micali's desertion of God's altar for his own devices, appropriately ushered in?

MARY. Robbing his mother of eleven hundred shekels of silver. I fear she was little better than himself, for she "cursed" about the loss of her money.

MAMA. Your accusation is natural, from the words of our translation. But the original imports quite another thing, viz. that she laid under a judicial curse the individual of her household who should have taken and concealed her property; an imprecation which, on the confession of her son, she quickly converted into a blessing.

MARY. She might have spared it, if she had thought how much more sin the money would be MAMA. But so far from deeming sinful the mitigated form of idolatry which her son was about to set up, this misguided woman had herself designed the silver for a "graven image and a molten image!" How does it appear that she deluded herself into a belief of her intention being praiseworthy?

MARY. She says she had dedicated them "unto the Lord." Did she never read the second comman! aem, about "graven images?"

Mama. Mary! your question, somewhat childish, for one who might know, that in those days, ave, for centuries after, the readers of Scripture were confined to a small and privileged numberrecalls us to what can never be often enough prized and commemorated, viz. our inestimable advantages of spiritual instruction. Remote from Shiloh, where alone the Ark and Testimony of God resided-indisposed by indolence, to resort thither-the family of Micah were so destitute of religious knowledge, as to think of propitiating the (to them) "unknown God" of Israel by graven images; to consecrate one of their own household a priest, to Him who had "chosen the sons of Aaron to stand before him for ever," and to grasp at a young vagrant Levite (as ignorant and more inexcusable than themselves) as a "father" sent from Heaven to preside over their unauthorised service!

MARY. I am at a loss to know what the image could be which Micah's mother told the "found-er" to make for her. She speaks of the Lord as if she was not an idolater; and yet her son must have been one, for it says that Micah " had an house of gods."

MAMA. Both were in so far true, that though Jehovah seems still to have been the object of their ignorant worship, they offered it through the forbidden medium of visible images. But did this "setting up" in His place of something that God had expressly forbidden, complete the convenient imitation of holy things, by which Micah sought to atone for his slothful absence from the sanctuary of God?

MARY. No, he "made an ephod." That was a consecrated garment I know, for little Samuel wore one from his cradle; but what were "teraphim?"

MAMA. A species of images, by which it has been thought he intended to imitate the two cherubims which adorned the ark of the covenant; and thus lend a mimic glory to his, alas! wholly unsanctified mockery of the "place where God had put his name to dwell there."

MARY. How could he "consecrate his son to be a priest?"

by the A. He who (as we remarked once of Jeroboam) imagined himself able to "set up" gods, and a form of religion, might well be guilty of the lesser presumption of constituting ministers. Yet we that misgivings of his son's insufficiency induced Micah eagerly to embrace the first opportunity of purchasing for his sin the countenance of an authorized servant of the sanctuary. Who was he?

MARY. A "young man of the family of Judah." How could one of another tribe be a Lerite?

MAMA. I am glad you inquired into the seeming inconsistency. The Levites, you know, were appointed to dwell in all the tribes of Israel, in cities set apart for their express residence; and Bethlehem Judah was this young son of Levi's allotted abode; had not "a truant disposition," and probably some errors in conduct there, driven him forth, a wanderer and an outcast, to seek and find, in a vagrant life, the fertile occasions of sin. How did these now present themselves?

MARY. By Micah asking him to be his priest, and offering him clothes, and wages, and victuals. I daresay they were very welcome to one who had no home.

MAMA. Of course; but should they have blinded one, brought up in the fear, and set apart for the service of the Lord, to the sin of assuming the priesthood (to which as a mere Levite he had no claim); of presiding over forbidden image worship, and settling himself, for worldly considerations, at a distance from his appointed scene of duty, in the family of an idolater? Yet so completely can self-interest and self-love obscure the plainest dictates of reason and revelation, that not only was the young man "content to dwell with Micah and be his priest," but the latter allowed himself to regard as an express token of favour from the God he was disobeying, that he should have fallen on one of his servants to abet him in his sacrilegious impiety! It is good for us to trace, in the conduct of another, the lengths of self-deception to which a combination of wilful ignorance, carnal indolence, and spiritual pride may Supposed imcarry any one among ourselves. provements on the commanded service of God, or mere substitutes for it, did not cease with the dark days of Micah; and there are few founders of sects, however absurd or impious, who have not (like him) been able to persuade themselves, that, in superseding his plain precepts, they "did God service."

We shall now see that the delusion was not confined to the infatuated Micah, and his household. How came the tribe of Dan to have yet to seek an inheritance? Had none been assigned them?

Mary. Surely it had; though I don't think we read about it.

MAMA. No, it was in a chapter of Joshua, omitted as merely containing similar details. But a reference to it enables us to see that sinful want of far h and activity to conquer the greater part of the callotted territory, had straitened them for room, and forced them to attempt an establishment elsewhere; and it was in prosecution of this design that the events occurred which we are about to discuss. What was the object of the five men who sought hospitality from Micah?

MARY. "To search the land." Mama! I wonder how they could know the voice of the young Levite; had they seen him before?

MAMA. Probably not, yet his dialect, as a dweller in Judah, might (as we lately saw in the case of the Gileadites) have sufficiently differed from that of Ephraim, to betray his being a stranger there. But what sad proof did their conduct to him soon afford that ignorance of God, and his appointed service, was shared by the Danites with the inhabitants of Ephraim?

MARY. I suppose their bidding the Levite "ask counsel for them of God." They might have known that He would not be "inquired of" by such as him, or in any place except Shiloh.

MAMA. Certainly; yet the reference to Divine guidance shews a sense (though erroneous) of religion, and is less reprehensible than the presumption of that "blind leader of the blind," who must have taken upon himself to furnish the answer.

MARY. But, Mama, it came true.

MAMA. Yes, like many similar unanthorised oracles, its encouraging tenor probably contributed (together with the facility of the enterprize itself), to ensure success. In what state were the unsuspecting people of Laish?

MARY. "Dwelling carelessly," with no "magistrate" over them, or any one to help them.

MAMA. And of what nature was the country thus exposed to invaders?

MARY. " A large land, a place where there is no want of any thing that is in the earth."

MAMA. Tempting news these, for a people straitened on every side by powerful enemies, and hemmed up by them into a mountainous, and probably barren district. How many warriors were sent to make this desirable conquest?

MARY. "Six hundred men, appointed with weapons of war." But what a shameful return it was in the "five men" who had been entertained by Micah to put it in their brethren's head to take away his images!

MAMA. And what a fearful proneness to idolatry did it manifest, when the bare idea of possessing such forbidden treasures, could not only sanction, but justify, in their eyes, an act of shameless robbery! But were they content with forcibly carrying off the household gods of Micah?

MARY. No, they bribed away his very Levite, by telting him how much better it was to be priest to a whole tribe than to one family. And the ungrateful creature went, and it says "his heart was glad."

MAMA. And can ingratitude to man surprise you, in a minister of the sanctuary, who had first forgotten, and then dishonoured his God? Interest, hope of gain and preferment, first attached him to the family of Micah; and, for greater gain, and more gratified ambition, he betrayed, and left his benefactor without a sigh. What effect had the whole iniquitous transaction on Micah, and his superstitious neighbours?

MARY. Mama, one can hardly help being sorry for him, when he says, "Ye have taken away my gods which I made, and the priest; and what have I more?"

Mama. Yes, if the blasphemous absurdity of the charge, as it sounds on a Christian ear, were not enough to stifle all sympathy. "My gods which I made!" Is there not, in the expression itself, wherewithal to rebuke the gross folly which gave it birth? To grieve over that as an object of worship, which it was in the power of "thieves to break through and steal," does not all this seem to us the extreme of childishness; and warrant the conclusion that the fatal prevalence of idolatry must have been founded on something congenial to it in the corruption of the heart of man, rather than on that human reason to which it offers one perpetual insult?

But did the idle lamentations of Micah procure the restoration of those images, whose loss was after all, but a just retribution for his own robbery of his mother  $\epsilon$

MARY. Oh! no—he was advised to hold his tongue, or else his life might have been taken too.

MAMA. Yes—for in those days, as we read, there was "no magistrate," by whom the spoilers might have been compelled to relinquish their prize. Whither did their unhallowed spoil accompany them?

MARY. To Laish; and they killed the poor quiet secure people, and burnt their town, and built another, and called it "Dan."

MAMA. Does the erection here of Micah's

" images" recall to you any later event of the same kind, by which Dan was rendered unhappily fame as in Israel?

MARY. Let me think. Was not one of Jeroboam's calves set up at Dan, and one at Bethel;

MAMA. Exactly; and as it is said here that image-worship precailed in Dan, more or less, till the capt by, we may trace to a lamentably remote person, the effects of this original transgression of the first great commandment of the law, by the single fame of Micah.

Thus we are led to close, as we commenced, our remarks upon this day's reading; and derive from it the wholesome lesson, for which doubtless it was recorded in Holy Writ, viz. that the sins of individuals involve often a degree and extent of responsibility before which the most thoughtless would shrink, and the most hardened tremble. If Micah, to save himself the trouble of worshipping (as every male in Israel was expressly commanded to do), three times a-year, in Shiloh, had not made forbidden idols; if, to procure himself an unlawful livelihood, the vagabond Levite had not first become a partner in Micah's guilt, and then, by a favourable response from an imaginary deity, flattered the ambition and avarice of a band of Danite robbers and plunderers, their whole tribe might have continued to worship God in his appointed place and manner; and Dan, instead of sharing the revolt of Jeroboam, and remaining for centuries a stronghold of idolatry, and a "reproach in Israel," might have come down to us, unstained by rebellion against its monarch, and apostasy from its God.

MORNING SIXTEENTH.

ta sox-dudges. Chapters xix, xx, & xxi

M. MA. If our last reading, my dear Mary, instructively exemplified the extended iniquity, of which an individual transgression is too often the fertile parent, we have the same lesson yet more forcibly inculcated in the distressing history of today. To the conjugal infidelity of one of those inferior wives, whose toleration among the Jews we have so often had occasion to deplore, and whose servile origin and degraded station in the household of their husbands, deprived them of the strongest motives to irreproachable conduct in women, may be traced not only the brutal inhospitality of the inhabitants of Gibeah; the savage ferocity with which it was avenged by the incensed Benjamites, and the retaliatory slaughter (almost to extermination of the latter tribe), but the unjustifiable violence with which hundreds of innocent maidens were made to expiate, by unmerited separation from their own parents, the guilt of one who took refuge with her's from the just anger of an offended husband.

Of what tribe was the individual thus injured?

MARY. A Levite of Mount Ephraim. Should his wife not have been of that tribe also?

MAMA. Undoubtedly; and one of the evils, as we have seen, of this description of marriages, was indifference to the country, or even religion, of the woman. But do you recollect the fearful punishment to which wives (even of this subordinate class), were liable, by the law of Moses, when convicted of adultery?

MARY. Oh! yes, they might be stoned to death; like the woman, you know, in the New Testament, that was brought before our Lord. It was no wonder the Levite's wife ran away for fear of it.

MAMA. But was it not wonderful that a lusband, so grievously offended, should (in the spirit of our gracious Master) have shown himself so mild and forgiving; and have sought, by kindness, to reclaim his siming partner? Well did such forbearance merit the gratitude it seems to have excited in the penitent wife and her father, as showed by the latter's repeated attempts to detain his son-in-law. But we have, in the sequel of the history, a sad and striking proof that, when most amply pardoned by man, the well-nigh forgot sin" will "find out," and rise up against sen a repentant transgressor; and, in this case, the punishment was brought about (though unintentionally), by the imprudence of the reconciled hu-band himself.

To what unnecessary danger did his obstinacy, in descripting at a late hour, expose the travellers? Notes. It first nearly obliged him to stop for the soft at Jebus; and you know that town belonged still to the heathen Jebusites. But it seems hard that after refusing to stay among idolaters, he should have been worse used among his own people.

MAMA. That it fared worse with him in consequence, is not likely; as, in all probability, the gross iniquity of Gibeah arose from its near neighbourhood to the Canaanite city of Jebus; while the existence of the latter, in the heart of Israel, may be traced (as we have already seen), to the indolence and cowardice of those very Benjamites on whom God was ere long to be so signally avenged! Did so much as one of this tribe (to whom the city of Gibeah belonged), vindicate its character for kindness and hospitality?

MARY Oh! no; nobody asked the Levite in, except an old countryman of his own, from a Mount Ephraim," coming a from his work out of the field at even."

Mama. Poor he may probably have been in worldly circumstances, but " rich in good works. and willing to communicate," as is proved by his warm and liberal salutation; while his piety may be inferred from his readiness to entertain a servant of the sanctuary, then on his way to Shilo: to offer (it is supposed) before the Lord, an atoming sacrifice for the guilt of his erring wife. Bar the poor creature's fatal deviation from duty was about to be visited with fearful retribution, by the very sinful passions which had first made her an alien from her husband's protecting roof. Thrust out (as an hostage for the lives of all within), from that of the friendly Ephraimite, she soon fell a sacrifice to a cruelty, at which many are disposed to shudder, who think little of the more lingering misery to which human vices daily consign their thousands of wretched victims.

How did this heart-rending catastrophe affect the unhappy husband?

MARY. Mama, I think he was hardly less cruel than those who killed her, when he could cut her up in twelve pieces and send her, "together with her bones, into all the coasts of Israel."

MAMA. The expedient, shocking as it seems to us, was by no means unexampled, and probably designed to express, by its very fearfulness, the ardour of his thirst for revenge.

We are many instances in scripture and ancient 1 story, of animals thus divided and distributed mong allies, as incentives to mutual support: ad, by sending a portion also to "Benjamin, is point the Levite meant to consider even the ! the offending tribe, as involved in , of procuring him justice. Whatever we may trink of the bloody summons, it completely answered its purpose; first, by exciting universal attention and horror; and then, by uniting "all Israel as one man" before the Lord, to whom, as suprense arbiter (for you remember this happened when there were no judges), the case was to be solemnly referred.

How numerous was the warlike assemblage thus arrayed by the wrongs of one heart-broken husband?

MARY. "Four hundred thousand footmen that drew sword!" I don't think, in spite of the "piece" sent to them, that any Benjamites were among them, for it only says, they had "heard that the children of Israel were gone up to Mizpeh."

MAMA. No; either conscious shame for, or participation in the guilt of their clansmen, withheld them from the national inquest. What effect had the simple tale of the bereaved Levite on his assembled countrymen? MARY. They were "knit together as one man" to go up against Gibeah. But they really behaved better than one would have expected from people so angry; for they sent messengers first to try and get the persons who had done the wickedness put to death, before they punished the whole tribe.

Mama. And was this wise and equitable proposition accorded to?

Mary. No, no; "the Benjamites would not hearken to the voice of their brethren, but gathered themselves to go out to battle." Nobody could be sorry for them now!

MAMA. No; because they thus solemnly sanctioned and defended the guilt it was their duty to have denounced and abjured. What number of fighting men was this (the least tribe in Israel) enabled to muster against the national army?

Myny. 6 Twenty-six thousand," besides the seven hundred wicked men of Gibeah, who deserved to be all killed. But why were seven hundred chosen left-handed?

MAMA. For the superior facility thus afforded in the use of the sling, a weapon to which, insignificant as it appears, the Israelites had been chiefly reduced, by the policy of their heathen oppressors, in depriving them (as we have lately read) of swords and spears. That, when dexterously wielded, it could prove merring, we have an instance in the case of David and Goliath; and heathen authors mention the diligence of various nations in training their children from the cradle to this primitive species of warfare.

MARY. Mama! I cannot help being much surprised that the wicked Benjamites twice got the better of the children of Israel; who, besides being so much in the right, were twenty times as many!

Myra. It would indeed be surprising, were it not that those very circumstances (viz. their rightcous cause, and overwhelming numbers) to which you allude, are supposed to have created in them an over-weening confidence, which He who "seeth not as man seeth," saw fit to humble by repeated discomfitures.

MARY. But they had "asked counsel of God" even at the very first; and that was what made me wonder they should not succeed.

MAMA. I am glad you thus bore in mind the usual scriptural connexion between acknowledgment of God and consequent victory. But the reference to the Almighty seems, in the first instance, to have been slight and formal; merely relating to the precise order of battle, and not invoking the blessing of the God of armies, or what might then have been styled a "holy war."

MARY. But, after the first defeat, they "wept before the Lord until even." They were surely sincere and religious then, and yet they lost another battle.

Mama. Even if we give them credit for a sincerity of which none but He who reads the heart can judge, and, were we able to discriminate between tears of shame and sorrow, and those of gennine lumiliation before God, there might still be need in this case for farther demonstration, that the "battle is not always to the strong," before thorough conviction could ensue, that neither the justice of their quarrel nor the force of the number could (apart from the Divine co-operation) secure them the hoped-for triumph. We know not what vindictive and unbrotherly feelings might lurk beneath the mask of equity, to mar and deface in the sight of God the apparently sacred work of retribution: but one circumstance we do know, by which the character of the Israelites' second humiliation was materially changed, and by which it was probably at length rendered effectual. Can you find me this from the words of the narrative?

Mary. Oh! I see many things that show they were in earnest at last, and really humbled before God. They "fasted this time until even, and offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings before the Lord."

MAMA. Yes; to the tardy fulfilment of an indispensible religious duty, on all solemn occasions (for " without shedding of blood," says the scripture. "there is no remission,") we are authorized to attribute the signal success which, when thus propitiated in His own appointed way, God at length vouchsafed to promise to His penitent people. But the inquiry itself, on former occasions so hastily and slightly conducted, was now distinguished by another indispensible requisite. viz. the interposition of God's High Priest; whom, for the first time, we now hear of as standing " before the ark," and fulfilling between the Lord and his people that mediatorial office without which prayer was then, as now, a mockery, and, " asking counsel of the Lord," unauthorised presumption.

Who was the High Priest thus favourably replied to by Jehovah?

MARY. Phinheas, the grandson of Aaron. Washe still alive so long after?

MAMA. You forget what his being still in existence corroborates, viz. that we have lately gone back to a period but shortly subsequent to the death of Joshua, and prior; as I told you, to the appointment of Judges; a circumstance arising from the more private and local character of the events recorded in the latter chapters of the book we are this day tracing to its close. And to this conclusion we must hasten. What was the result of the protection of the Most High when at length acceptably invoked?

MARY. Oh! victory of course; for the Lord "destroyed that day twenty-five thousand, one hundred men of Benjamin before Israel." Mama! there were only twenty-six thousand seven hundred at first! This was a terrible slaughter!

MAMA. Yes, as we before remarked, it amounted almost to extermination. Such judgments has national wickedness the power to draw down; and thus was the justice of God vindicated from the apparent impunity allowed them in former conflicts. What was the refuge of the miserable remnant of six hundred men now left to Benjamin?

MARY. "They fled into the wilderness, and abode four mouths in the rock of Rimmon."

MAMA. And was the vengeance of Israel limited to the slaughter of the battle field?

Mary. No; they killed the very beasts; and they must have slain the women also, else they would not have been at a loss for wives to the six hundred remaining men. No wonder they were sorry when they came to think of what they had done. Surely God did not mean them to carry things so far.

MAMA. We might have been inclined to think so, has it not been said below that it was " the Lord who made that great "breach in Israel," whice his metable instruments so soon came to repent. But, whether proceeding from the excess of human severity, or the just decree of God, the event was in the eyes of brethren, a national calamity, and, as such, both naturally and properly deplored. And we cannot wonder that bitter regrets and have mingled with the sacrifices, by which so painful a conquest was fearfully commemorated. Of the sinfulness and inconvenience of rash yows, we have a fresh proof in the inconsiderate engagement entered into at Mizpeli, that no Israelite should give his daughter to one of the tribe of Benjamin. In what dilemma did this unfraternal resolution involve the relenting Israelites ?

MARY. They said, what "shall we do for wives to them that remain, seeing we have sworn by the Lord that we will not give them of our daughters." Mama, surely, as we said about Jephthah, God would have been less angry if they had broken their word, than that even one person should be murdered to let them keep it.

MAMA. Unquestionably; but we learn from this choice of evils, the utility of our Lord's admonition, "Swear not at all;" evidently directed against unnecessary oaths, though perverted by some to the withholding of testimony in courts of justice. What bloody expedient did the Israelites fall upon to keep their vow unbroken?

MARY. Killing all the people of Jabesh-gilead, to get their daughters for wives to the Benjamites. Mama, this was as bad as Samson killing the Philistines to get their clothes to pay his wager with.

MAMA. The cases are not quite similar; as by another stern oath, all who (like the people of Jabesh-gilead) absented themselves from the national muster, had been relentlessly doomed to destruction.

But in what more pleasing and brotherly spirit were the miscrable Benjamite refugees re-admitted into the "commonwealth of Israel."

MARY. "The whole congregation sent some to speak to and to call peaceably unto them; and Benjamin came again at that time."

MAMA. How affecting is the inspired historian's simple record of a reconciliation fraught with such complicated emotions! And how pleasing is it (amid much to shudder over and condemn), to observe the solicitude of the nation for the brother, who, like the prodigal of scripture, had thus been lost and was found." Not one of the other tribes even attempted to aggrandize itself by appropriating any part of the inheritance unpeopled by the late calamity; but, on the contrary, they sought to repair it as rapidly as possible, by providing the wretched remnant with wives. How was the requisite number at length completed?

Myny. The Benjamites were advised to lie in wait for the daughters of Shiloh, when they should come out to dance in the vineyards. Was their dancing sinful or idolatrous that these girls were fixed o ?

MAMA. No; on the contrary, it is supposed that the festival here alluded to was that of Tabernacles; which, occurring in the season of the vintage, was always celebrated with great rejoicings. And Shiloh, the place where alone it could be lawfully celebrated, was of course pointed out as the scene of the intended violence. How was it to be palliated in the eyes of the justly incensed parents?

MARY. The whole people were to beg them to pass it over for their sakes; and to consider that they were saved by it from breaking their word, and giving the Benjamites wives voluntarily, when they had promised not.

MAMA. And thus ended in rapine and subterfuge, what had begun in adultery and elopement, and led (as we have sadly seen) to civil war, disgrace, and massacre! Let us lay to heart, my dear Mary, the impressive lesson, that all this occurred in Israel in those unhappy days "when there was no king, and where every man did that which was right in his own eyes." And, when we read (as yesterday) of idolatry flourishing amid contempt, and disuse of national religion; and (as to-day) of licentiousness and rapine arising from the absence of wholesome legal authority, let us draw fresh encouragment in these evil times to "fear God and honour the king." To bless Him, "from whom cometh down every good and perfect gift," for the boon of a pure and scriptural church; and to do homage to Him, "by whom kings reign," in the person of His appointed human vicegerent.

MORNING SEVENTEENTH.

LESSON-Ruth, Chapters i, and ii.

My :. Oh! Mama, what a beautiful day's reading we have had! and how delightful it is to hear of sweet Ruth, and her dutiful behaviour to her mother, and her gleaning in the harvest-field, after all the fighting and wickedness we read of in the book of Judges!

MAMA. Your remark is very natural; and proves (independently of the more attractive nature of the subject) how infinitely deeper is the hold taken of our feelings by the simple history of individuals, than by the destiny of nations? But how, do you think, came the life of so humble a person as Ruth, to be recorded at such length, and in a separate form, in the Jewish Scriptures?

MARY. I never thought of that; or how a poor gleaner came to have the honour of a book to herself. Was it in reward of her duty and kindness to Naomi?

MAMA. These, though they brought, even in this world, their own rich recompence, in prosperity, distinction, and knowledge of the true God; and though they doubtless indirectly contributed to the honourable place assigned in the Hebrew Canon to the memory of Ruth, are insufficient to account for it without a further circumstance in her history, which we will not anticipate, by considering to-day. In the mean time, let us be thankful for the example it sets before us, of the blessing of God on the two great duties of filial piety and cheerful industry; and strive to improve it by careful investigation.

At what period of the history of the Israelites are the events recorded in the book of Ruth, said to have happened?

MARY. "In the days when the Judges ruled." That is a wide word, Mama!

MAMA. And the precise period must ever remain in some degree uncertain; though learned men (from no other famine being specially mentioned) have been inclined to identify the one in the time of Gideon, with that which drove into exile the family of Elimelech. Of what tribe was this individual?

Mary. An Ephrathite of Beth-lehem-judah.

MAMA. For which latter place Ephratah was another name. But his tribe, viz. that of Judah is what the future part of the history requires us to bear in mind. What violation of the law of Moses was the first, and not unnatural, consequence of the residence of a Jewish family in a heating land?

MARY. Elimelech's two sons married women of Moab. I daresay this was because they continued there, as it says they did, even after their father's death. Surely the famine in their own comezy must have been over by that time, or else Boas, would not have had corn fields to glean in.

MAMA. A very just remark. Mary, and one with which I am much pleased. Necessity may compel, for a time, the servants of God to associate with unbelievers; but no one, who has at heart either his safety or salvation, will prolong, voluntarily, so dangerous an intercourse.

How long were Mahlon and Chilion suffered to enjoy their unhallowed connexions?

MARY. About ten years, and then they both died. Did God punish them for marrying heathen women?

MAMA. It has been so conjectured by some expositors. But, as marriages among the Jews were contracted at a very early age, and under the immediate sanction of parental authority. I should be more inclined to read the Divine displeasure in the destitution and desolation of their surviving parent. But were this mere conjecture even well-founded, we have in the issue, a remarkable proof of the power of the Almighty to bring good out of evil; and of his tender pity for a forlorn widow, by over-ruling, for her consolation and support, a connexion she must either have piously disapproved of, or sinfully connived at.

What was the first wish that arose in her bosom on finding herself (in the affecting words of Scripture) " left of her two sons and her husband?"

MARY. To "return from the country of Moab; for she had heard there how that the Lord had visited his people, in giving them bread." Do you think she had only just heard this?

MAMA. Perhaps not, Mary; but the warnings, nay invitations, to return to our "better country," and our "Father's house," which fall unheeded on the ear of prosperity and affluence, find a leady echo in the bereaved and desolate heart. How many, besides Naomi, have had cause to say with David, "It is good for me that I have been afflicted," and whom that very affliction improved and sanctified, has been the means of turning once more "with their faces Zion-ward!"

Who accompanied Naomi part of the way towards her beloved land of Judah?

MARY. Her two daughters-in-law. How beautifully she advises them to leave her, and return home to their mother's house, and wishes them happiness with other husbands! Mama, Naomi must have been a good woman.

MAMA. We have every reason to think so, both from her constant pious reference to "the Lord" in her addresses to her widowed daughters, and from that great feature of an amiable character, the absence of selfishness; which made her not only dissuade them from sharing her poverty, but a gived those touching words, "Nay, my daughters; for it grieveth me much, for your sakes, that the hand of the Lord is gone out against me." For herself, she felt that her years were few, and her joys and sorrows alike buried in the grave; but she could look forward not only without bitterness, but with maternal sympathy to the more prosperous lot which might yet be in store for Ruth and Orpah.

MARY. Mama, what does she mean by asking if they would wait for her sons, were she even to have any? Could sisters-in-law marry their husbands' brothers?

MAMA. Not only were they authorized, but even obliged by the law of Moses, to form such connexions, in cases where no child remained to keep up the deceased brother's rights and name. The obligation, frequently alluded to in Scripture, as resting on the next brother, or (failing him) on the nearest relation, to marry the widow of the elder branch of the family, is quite necessary to be known for the understanding of the latter part of Ruth's history. But do you not recollect a singular, and we should suppose imaginary case of the kind, on which our Lord's opinion was insidiously sought by those of his countrymen who disbelieved in a resurrection from the dead?

MARY. Oh, yes! about the seven brethren who all married one wife. I might have remembered that for its strangeness.

MAMA. I hope you remember the use made of it by our Lord, not only for confirming the reality of a resurrection, but for rectifying the absurd earthly notions entertained by those of the Jews who admitted one.

What effect had the disinterested counsels of Naomi on her two daughters-in-law?

MARY. They both wept again; and "Orpah kissed her mother in law, but Ruth clave unto her."

Mama. How expressive are these few words! and how forcibly do they discriminate between the idle sympathy which evaporates in tears, and those substantial acts of duty and kindness which alone demonstrate its sincerity! Did Naomi, solitary and friendless as she was, at once selfishly grasp at the filial devotedness of Ruth?

MARY. Oh no, Mama; you know Naomi was not selfish. So she still (though I am sure she must have wished to have her) advised Ruth to "go nock to her people." But she surely could not be sincere in advising her to go back (like Orp h) to her gods!"

Many. We should be very rash in imputing to the pious Naomi so unworthy an advice, as there is nothing said here of Ruth returning to her gads; and as it has been generally supposed that while both sisters had become in some measure proselytes from their sojonrn in a Jewish family, the conversion of Ruth at least, was sincere and permanent. This seems proved not only by her decided adoption (which affection alone might have dictated) of the "God," as well as "people" of Naomi, but by her solemn adjuration of "the Lord do so to me and more also, if aught but death part thee and me;" which in the month of any but a converted Jewess would have been unmeaning and misplaced.

But let us pause a moment, my child, to bid our hearts expand in exquisite enjoyment of that declaration of Ruth's, whose inimitable pathos no mere human composition has ever equalled or approached. How does this devoted daughter, this "friend that sticketh closer than a brother," declare her unalterable resolution to cheer with her presence, in life and death, the solitary hearth of the returning wanderer?

MARY. Oh! I know it by heart, it is so beautiful; "Intreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest I will go, and where thou lodgest I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God!"

MAMA. And observe how the latter part of the glorious resolution, by which the whole was wound up and sanctified, had power to crown, with the richest spiritual blessings, the heroic adoption of poverty and exile contained in its former clauses. In sharing the lodging, and adhering to the fate of Naomi, want and misery (to be alleviated only by incessant toil), was the portion voluntarily chosen by Ruth. Among the "people" she said should henceforth be her own, the stranger Moabitess could find, as she well knew from rigid Jewish customs, "neither part nor inheritance." In affinity to the God of Naomi, could alone have consisted the superior value of the course she unhesitatingly embraced; and though filial affection, and the softest feelings of compassion for age and destitution no doubt influenced her determination, it was not the less accepted by Him whose influence on our hearts is best manifested by right principles in our conduct towards our fellow creatures.

MARY. Mama! how sad must have been Naomi's return to Beth-lehem without her husband and sons! And she was so changed that people hardly knew her. What does she mean by bidding them call her "Mara," instead of "Naomi?"

MAMA. Because the latter vame (which signifies "pleasant." or "councly"), she felt to be now sadiy inapplicable to her saddened mind and shatter of frame. But it is not the first time the name "colors" has occurred in our reading; do you recollect its former application during the wanderings of Israel in the wilderness?

MARY. Oh! I remember, "Marah" was the name of a bitter fountain that nobody could drink of till Moses put a branch in to make it sweet. Does the word mean "bitterness?"

MAMA. It does; and well might the sad heart of one, all whose joys a few short years had sufficed to turn into sorrow, adopt the ominous appellation; so expressive at once of hec mental feelings and external distress!

MARY. But, Mama, I don't exactly know why Naomi should have remained poor. The widow we read about who came back after the famine in Elisha's time, "cried to the king for her house and land," and got them.

Mama. I am very glad you remember this, but the very circumstance of a prophet's intercession and a king's interposition being necessary to reinstate the once wealthy and powerful Shanamite. will shew how little chance of justice the friendless Naomi could have had at a period when the often interrupted sway of the Judges left men but too much " to do what was right in their own eyes." Let us be thankful that we live in times when the rightful inheritance of the meanest is as secure as the possession of the prince!

But even by the Jewish law, on the death of Elimelech and his sons, his portion of land would have fallen to his nearest, and as we shall soon see, not unworthy relative. How was this amiable successor of Elimelech called?

Mary. Boaz; and he was a mighty man of wealth; just, I suppose, what Naomi's husband himself had once been.

Mama. Yes, if we may conjecture from her own "bitter" sense of her reverses. To what degree of abject poverty had these reverses now reduced her and her daughter in law?

Mary. They must have been starving; for Ruth asked leave to go and glean in any body's field that would let her. Perhaps she did not know that the good God of the Jews had ordered corn to be left expressly for poor people.

MAMA. Or, more likely, she doubted her own right as a "stranger" to the merciful provision of Him, who, however, had made not only kindness to the persons, but tenderness to the feelings et "strangers," the subject of a beautiful precept. How aid her husband's cousin (to whose field God, in His wisdom, directed her steps), testify vis obedience to the beneficent injunction?

Mate. By asking his servant, when he saw a strange damsel, at once, who she was; and then speaking so kindly to her, and bidding her stay in hes. In any abide by his maidens, and telling her no one should hart her, but she might glean where she pleased.

Mama. Yes, my dear Mary; there does indeed breathe the very soul of pious benevolence, as well as of pastoral simplicity, through the whole dialogue; first between this patriarchal master and his reapers, (in which they mutually invoke on each other the blessing of God), and then between the same excellent man, "rich in good works and ready to communicate," and the deserving object of his almost parental interest! On what particulars in her conduct does he state this interest to have been founded?

MARY. On her kind behaviour to her mother in law, and her leaving her own country and people to follow her back into Judah.

MAMA. True: but to what higher motive does he also ascribe this last part of her conduct?

MARY. "Trusting under the wings of the Lord

God of Israel;" and he prays God to recompense her fully for it.

MAMA. Little did he as yet foresee that he was to be made the instrument by whom the rich reward was to be conveyed! In the mean time, what further privilege did her modest demeanour induce him to extend to her?

MARY. He gave her leave to dine with his own reapers; and the meal seems a very strange one—bread soaked in vinegar! But I remember your telling me, when I wondered at the Jews offering our Lord "vinegar to drink," that it was only the "gall" mixed among it, which made it cruel or uncommon. How little the Jews' customs seem to have changed all through the Bible!

MAMA. Nay, how little have eastern customs changed to this day! for the very primitive refreshment provided for the reapers of Boaz, is at this moment doled out by the Algerines to their Christian captives; many of whom, I daresay, till their captivity, had wondered, and perhaps scoffed, at the simplicity of Scripture manners.

But we must return to Ruth. How was the indulgence of Boaz gradually extended?

MARY. By letting her glean among the very shearers; and even telling his people to let handfuls fall on purpose. Surely he must have begun to think of marrying her already.

MAMA. We have no reason for attributing to him, as yet, any such intention; or assigning selfish motives for deeds of the purest benevolence. During the whole of the subsequent harvest, Boaz suffered her to continue in her humble vocation, nor did the glaring disproportion in their age and circumstances allow him (while yet unaware of that pleasing combination of duty with esteen, which afterwards brought about their union) to think of allying himself in a manner unsuitable to his rank and station.

But how may we gather that this union was, even now, contemplated as possible by Naomi?

MARY. She prays for a blessing on him from the Lord, and seems glad that Ruth had gleaned in his fields and received kindness from him, but I cannot find out any place where she seems to hope he would be her husband.

MAMA. This arises from the English expression, "The man is one of our next kinsmen," not conveying the full sense of the original Hebrew, "this man is one of our redeemers," meaning thereby, those in whom, by the law of Moses, the right of "redemption" of not only the lands, but the "wife" of a deceased relative rested. Naomi does not positively assert Boaz to be the meanst of kin (as indeed it afterwards appeared be was not.) but only so near as to make it highly probable the restoration of the fortunes of her family and daughter-in-law might (with prudence) be brought about in his person.

The means by which this happy event was achieved, we shall learn to-morrow; let us, in the mean time, observe the further acts of duty by which Ruth justified the benevolent predilection shewn her by Boaz, and contributed to her mother in law's support. What became of the produce of her labour, and his generosity?

MARY. "She beat it out at night, when she had done gleaning, and gave Naomi all that was over serving herself," and she minded her advice to "keep fast by the maidens of Boaz" all through the harvest; and when that was over, it says, "she dwelt with her mother in law."

MAMA. Yes; too happy if by patient industry, she had in any respect alleviated the pangs of poverty; and content to banish, by her cheerful society, the yet bitterer evil of solitude. Unseduced from her humble path by unexpected favour—unclated by the notice of her superior—content to take up, even for life, her abode in the humble "lodging" of Naomi, Ruth became, beneath the powerful teaching of adversity, eminently fitted for the prosperous lot to which her virtues were ere long to raise her; and earned by "patient continuance in well-doing." her title to that distinguished place in the history of Israel and genealogy of Christ, which we shall hereafter find her to enjoy.

In the mean time, I know not a piece of scripture biography (extensive as is that fertile field) from which a young female may derive more practical, as well as pleasing instruction. Compared with the heroism, the devotion, the disinterestedness of this Moabitish dansel, how cold, how selfish how worldly is the conduct of many a Christian daughter; even to that mother who possesses over her heart the far stronger claims of natural affection, identity of country, and the thousand cares and solicitudes which none but a real mother knows!

When you see, as alas! you may do, unfeeling butterflies, deserting, for the frivolities of gaiety, the lonely hearth, nay, even the lingering sick-bed of a declining parent, think of Ruth; who, when Orpah turned from Naomi with the worldling's hollow kiss of idle endearment, clare to her, "through evil report, and good report," in life, and in death!

When, at the command of fashion or curiosity, you see daughters of our true and spiritual church torsaking her pure worship and decent solemnity for the dazzling ritual of the aliens among whom they have chosen to sojourn, think of Ruth; who undervalued and left even country and kindred. for the superior benefit of adherence to the God of Naomi; though (unlike you) she knew him but in part, and saw but through the dark veil of the Jewish dispensation, a glimmering of his works and ways.

Above all, if tempted to purchase ease and competence by any sacrifice either of principle or rectitude, think of Ruth, who (like the great apostle who has recorded her) "laboured with her hands to be chargeable to no man;" and not for herself only, but for the indigent and helpless, whom God had cast upon her care! Perhaps there is not throughout the whole range of Scripture a character which, after contemplating it in its various features of piety, of disinterestedness, of diligence, and of filial obedience, we can so confidently sum up, and commend to the female reader, by the emphatic injunction, "Go thou, and do likewise."

MORNING EIGHTEENTH.

LESSON .- Ruth, Chapters in, and iv

Masta. This morning's reading commences with a pleasing display of the tenderness and gratitude experienced by Naomi, in return for the filial kindness and devotion of Ruth. The privations which these had entailed on her beloved daughter, and the solitude and destitution to which her own advanced age would, at no distant period. consign her, seem to have pressed heavily on the affectionate heart of Naomi: and it is no wonder that she sought to obviate them by insuring for her once more repose and prosperity, under the protection of a wealthy husband. The method employed for this purpose, however repugnant to our more fastidious ideas, was perfectly consonant not only to the customs, but positive institutions, of the age and country; nor must we allow its inconsistency with our own to cast a shadow of suspicion over the fair reputation of Ruth. What was the line of conduct dictated to her by Naomi?

MARY. Mama, I am glad you have told me it was not wrong; it seems so very odd.

MAMA. Yes, without a due knowledge of the manners and habits of the country and period, it might infer in the mother who commanded, and the daughter who obeyed, a degree of forwardness and levity, from which both were, in thought and action, equally free. But, setting aside the venerable age, near relationship, and truly paternal conduct towards Ruth, of the person on whose notice she was thus apparently obtruded-the whole proceeding, we must recollect, was viewed by all in the light of a mere legal challenge to the performance of a legal obligation, which (if proved to be indeed the next of kin of the deceased Elimelech) Boaz was too good a man to dream of declining; so that Ruth was already, in the eye of the law, his destined wife. If we take into the account also the public and primitive scene of this seeming intrusion, viz. an open thrashing-floor, where the patriarch lay down (probably among his labourers) to guard himself his heaps of winnowed corn; and that the people in eastern countries repose under a simple mat, seldom parting with any of their garments except their slippers -much of the apparent indecorum of the conduct we so much wonder at, will disappear, even in our eyes. That so far from being questionable in those of Boaz, it excited in him only the most grateful approbation, is evident from his pious salutation of "Blessed be thon of the Lord my daughter;" while his unshaken respect and esteem are proved by the emphatic addition, "for all the city of my people doth know that thou art a virtuous weman."

MAN : How did Boaz know what it was that Ruth : required of him" to do?

Mama. Two particulars in her address would make it perfectly evident to a Jew of those, or indeed our own, days. The expression to "spread his skirt" (or rather "wing") over his handmaiden, distinctly signified to espouse her; in token of which, in all Jewish marriages, the bridegroom still throws over the head of the bride the skirt of his wedding-garment. But besides this, Ruth, by calling Boaz his "near kinsman," or (as we said before) "redcemer," specially summoned him to fulfil that office, by marrying, according to law, the widow of his deceased relative. That this was perfectly understood by Boaz, is evident, both from his gratitude for her preference of a dutiful union with him to a more suitable connexion in point of age; and by his prudent expedient at once to fulfil the law by offering the right of redemption to him to whom it really belonged, and at the same time to secure to himself so rich a treasure of virtue and worth.

How, in the mean time, did he manifest his fatherly solicitude to avert from his future wife the slightest breath of suspicion?

MARY. By making her get up before there was light to know any one by.

MAMA. Yes, according to that precept of the apostle, by which we are commanded to avoid even "the appearance of evil." And how did he testify his gratitude for the share in his approaching happiness borne by Naomi?

MARY. By filling Ruth's veil with barley, to take home to her. Mama! I wonder he did not rather give her wheat?

MAMA. Not to mention that wheat and barley harvests being at quite different seasons in Judea, the latter only was probably at his disposal,—"barley cakes" are mentioned all through the Bible as the prevailing food of its inhabitants. Can you remember any instances?

MARY. Oh! yes, it was a "barley-cake' which a man dreamt had rolled, in Gideon's time (and that you said yesterday was the same as Ruth's) into the camp of Midian. And let me see, it was five "barley-loaves" with which our Lord fed the five thousand people in the wilderness. So I need not have wondered at Boaz sending it to poor Normi.

FAMA. And with what grateful exuitation must Ruth have displayed, and Naomi viewed, the seasonable supply of food; not only as the meed of her daughter's obedience and good conduct, but as the carnest of future plenty and prosperity. Was she justified in her shrewd guess that 'Book would urge to a speedy conclusion a matter in which his heart was now so deeply interested?

MARY. Oh yes; he went that very day, as she supposed. But why did he go and sit "in the gate?"

MAMA. As the usual place in those primitive times, both for the administration of justice, and the transaction of all legal affairs between man and man. Of this we have innumerable instances in Scripture, even so late as David, (the great-grandson of Ruth), and thence the figurative expression, (so frequent in the Bible), of "possessing the gate of their enemies," became equivalent to "having dominion over them."

Whom did Boaz summon as witnesses, in the solenm transaction between him and the still nearer kinsman of Ruth?

Mary. The elders of the city. This shewed be did not with do unfairly; though, I daresay, he was in a sad fright lest the man should choose to marry her himself. But had poor Naomi really land to sell? or did Boaz only say so, to try what he would do?

MAMA. We have no reason to suppose that any portion of the property of her deceased husband had indeed been restored to her; but if, as is probable, her claim over it remained, Boaz was justified in availing himself of the circumstance to draw from the nearest of kin, that distinct recognition of his right as such, which would give validity to his subsequent renunciation of it, when clogged with the condition of marrying the widow. Do you understand why this was declined by one, who was quite ready, on other terms, to have "redeemed" (that is "purchased") the land?

MARY. No Mama; why should his getting more land "mar the inheritance" he had already?

MAMA. It is rather of that of his children he is speaking; for the Chaldee interpreters of the passage explain it, that he had a wife already, and did not choose, by taking another, to risk introducing discord into his house, or injuring the interests of his existing family.

MARY. How strange a custom it was for people among the Jews to make bargains by giving each other their shoe!

MAMA. Not if the transaction, as here, related to land; the full right to tread or enter upon which, was very appropriately signified by handing over the present possessor's shoe. The Jews in later times have adopted, first a glove, and since then, a transkerchief for the same purpose of resignation and ratification.

M.av. Mama --how could Boaztake the people to witness that he had bought all her husband's and -one' land from Naomi, when she had not enough to keep her and Ruth from starving?

MAMA. This expression confirms our conjecture, that the right over them still resided in her, (or rather Ruth); though long absence and want of a protector had prevented the prosecution of a claim which, in the powerful hands of Boaz, would be easily and promptly enforced. But was it with purely selfish views that this good man contemplated the possession of Ruth and recovery of her property.

MARY. Oh! no; it was "to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance, that the name of the dead be not cut off from his brethren." Didthis mean that Ruth's children would be looked upon as her late husband's?

MAMA. In so far as succeeding to his name and property they certainly would; and this was the very reason why a wicked ancestor of Boaz incurred God's displeasure by declining to marry his brother's widow, according to the Mosaic law; and why, buying with money that might have been theirs, the land of Elimelech, which they could never succeed to—would have "marred the inheritance" of the first family of Ruth's nearest kinsman

In what terms did the surrounding assembly ratify and approve the resolution of Boaz?

MARY. "The Lord make the woman that is come into thine house like Rachel, and like Leah, which two did build the house of Israel; and be thou famous in Beth-lehem."

MAMA. Are you aware in how remarkable a manner (far beyond the limited views of its original afterers) this benediction was fulfilled in the family and seed of Ruth?

MARY. I see below, and you have told me, that her son Obed was grandfather to King David; that would make his family "famous in Israel."

MAMA. Have I not also told you, that a greater than even David (who, though his "father according to the flesh," was proud to call him "Lord,") conferred by his birth there, immortal renown on Beth-lehem Ephratah, "little among the thousands of Judah?" And that, as Rachel and Leah built up, by their progeny, the literal "house of Israel," so did Ruth, through that illustrious "seed," in whom all the nations of the earth" were to be bles. and up to the remotest generations the Chu of a wist, the "true I-rael of God!" It is from this circumstance that the history of Ruth deri - in our eyes its liveliest interest; and while . fer her, as the ancestress of David, diein reful cumieration of her descendants which the book closes, the Christian bebotes in it a valuable link in the yet more precious genealogy of Christ. It has been thought by many, that by the occurrence among the direct ancestry of our Lord, of two Gentile women, the faithful Rahab and dutiful Ruth-- was dimly shadowed forth the universality of that kingdom in which "there is no respect of persons," and in which the " wall of partition" between Jew and Gentile was for ever to be " broken down."

But we have yet some affecting particulars to notice regarding that precious child, whose far more illustrious "son according to the flesh," the bystanders at his birth unconsciously celebrated. Little did they dream, when exclaiming to the joyful mother of Ruth, "Blessed be the Lord which hath not left thee this day without a 'Redeemer' whose name shall be famous," of the fulfilment of these words in the redemption of mankind by the lineal descendant of Obed! Or, how emphatically "better indeed than seven sons," was the daughter, selected as the ancestress of such an illustrious "seed!"

But, confining ourselves at present to the literal sense of the strong expression—could any thing exceed the gratified affection and maternal pride of Naomi, while folding to her long desolate bosom the offspring of her beloved Ruth? Well might she behold in this child of promise, the "restorer of her life, and nourisher of her old age;" in whose smile she lived again, and who, (under the tuition of such a parent as Ruth), could not fail to emulate her in dutiful tenderness to a grandmother's declining years.

And now, Mary, let us turn to Rath herself, and ask, if it was not indeed "well with her," and if the "rest" Naomi's solicitude sought for her, was not indeed found? A lot of unexpected and unexampled prosperity was henceforth her's; and her's, remember, for following after and trusting in the Lord; for cleaving to, and fulfilling her appointed line of duty.

About Orpah and her fate we know and care nothing. She was of those "who mind earthly things," and are dead even while they yet live; and her memory has perished in the unrecorded fall of the idolaters among whom it was her choice to "abide." if ever, in that not distant land, tidings of Ruth's merited elevation reached her—envy and fruitless regret might embitter even her worldly pertion. But how far more different still will be their place in the world that is to come; when "many" (like Ruth) "shall have come from the east and the west, and the north and south, to sit down with Abra'ann, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of God!"

MORNING NINETEENTH.

Lesson,-1 Samuel, Chapters i, and ii.

MARY. Mama, I am very glad we are to read the whole history of Samuel; for though I have long known about him as a child. I don't remember him so well as a Judge and Prophet, and I believe he was both.

MAMA. He was; and it is chiefly with a view to trace to its conclusion in his person, the government by divinely appointed Judges, of the Children of Israel—that I have included in our present course of reading, part of the first of the two books, of which this eminent man was the avowed author. That he also wrote that of Judges we have already mentioned as probable; nor is it unlikely that for the beautiful pathos and simplicity of the story of Ruth, we are also indebted to his pen; in those latter years of his life, when the divine selection of the family of David, and his anointment by the hand of Samuel to the future sovereignty over God's people, had elevated into public importance the history of his ancestry.

and generlogy of his immediate forefathers. The similarity of style and subject between the book we have just 'inished, and the earlier part of that on which we are entering, favour the supposition that the came servant of God who has borne in the latter his fited tribute to the virtues of his own pious parent, was the recorder in the former of the kindred condact, and sentiments of Ruth. And great are the edge ones of female readers of the Bible to one, woo has rescued from oblivion, and held up for their instruction and imitation, a daughter and a mother to whom generations yet unborn may look for examples of filial and maternal duty.

Who was the husband of the highly favoured, though for a time-depressed and desponding Hannah?

MARY. A man named Elkanah; and (like Elimelech) he was an Ephrathite, which means, I think, that he lived in the country of Bethlehem.

MAMA. Yes; and the genealogy here assigned him has shewn (from comparison with other parts of Scripture) that he was of the tribe of Levi; a circumstance which, though apparently unimportant, invested his child with that legal qualification for ministering before the Lord, which was seldom, in the Old Testament times, dispensed with.

MARY. The two wives of Elkanah were just like Leah and Rachel. The one he loved best had no children, and the other "provoked her" about it.

MAMA. Yes, Mary, in both households, domestic discord and discomfort arose as usual, from a plurality of wives; and from the partialities perhaps inseparable from human nature. But did predilection for Hannah make Elkanah unjust or unkind to Peninnah and her family?

MARY. Oh! no; he gave them all "portions;" but to Hannah he gave a "worthy portion because he loved her."

MAMA. Are you aware of what nature was the distribution here noticed, and which you probably suppose to relate to the worldly goods of Elkanah; in which latter case it might have been unjust, as well as unequal? It was simply (like the fourfold "mess" sent by Joseph to his darling Benjamin), a larger allotment of the share which every devont Jew's family when worshipping at Shiloh, received back for their own use from the animals offered by him in sacrifice; and by liberality in which (as the wives of a household lived each apart from the other), Elkanah testified, notwithstanding her want of children, his superior regard for Hannah.

In what tender and consolatory terms does be farther seek to reconcile her to a disappointment which, as a member of so pious a family, she must  $\beta$  to K own and acknowledged to be "from the  $K \in \mathbb{N}^n$ "

Mary. Hannah, why weepest thou? and why eatest the coot, and why is thy heart grieved? Am not? after to thee than ten sons? Manna this is all tost the same expression as Ruth, being a bette their seven sons" to Naomi!

and one of peculiar force in a country and times when the possession of children ("sons" especially) was esteemed above every earthly blessing; and where the absence of them could mar, as in the case before us, the most enviable buneau let. But mark the difference in conduct under this affliction, between Hannah, the enlightened worships r of the true God, and that Rachel to whom you lately compared her; and who, (even after her long union with the devout Jacob), could secrete in her tent and heart the " images" of her father's household idolatry! " Cive me children or I die!" is the querulous exclamation of the latter; addressed to that fellow mortal, whose indignant reply of, " Am I in God's stead?" was her folly's proper and merited rebuke. But what, in similar "bitterness of soul," was the resource of Hannah?

Mary. Oh! she prayed unto the Lord, and vowed a vow, and promised if He would "remember her," and give her a child, to dedicate him to God all the days of his life. And "no razor was to come upon his head." Would that make him strong, like Samson?

Mama. I thought we had understood that the hair of Samson had nothing to do with his strength, farther than as its loss or possession denoted the breach or renewal of his covenant with God. It was to mark the dedication to "holiness" of her unborn babe, that Hannah proposed to make him a " Nazarite before the Lord." Have you ever considered how great a sacrifice the overflowing of a grateful heart here dictated to one, destined, we are sure, if ever there was such, to be a doating parent? Levites in general were not required to join the service of the temple until 25 years of age, nor to continue in it after 50; but "all the days of his life," was Hannah content to resign the society of her first, perhaps her only son, in requital of the goodness which should grant her a "man-child," and "take away her reproach."

But to what misconstruction did the passionate fervour of her silent supplication expose her, in the opinion of Eli, the High Priest?

MARY. I am almost ashamed to mention such a thing of a woman: he thought she had drunk too much! How could this have happened in the very temple of God, and in the time of a solemn sacrible?

Mana. Alas! Mary, the shameless excesses within the precincts of the sanctuary, of Eli's own profliga: sons, won't make him too easily suspicious of others! And those very family repasts which the hare elsewhere mentioned, as terminaed ac ceremonies, and giving a character of social cheerfulness to the festivals of the Jews, were perhaps but too liable to abuses, from which even the Lord's Supper, among the early Christians, was, we learn with shame, not wholly free, But how firmly, though mildly, does Hannah repel a charge, applicable only, as she truly says, to a " daughter of Belial;" and which it were well if the unhappy women who, in our latter days, disgrace by it both their sex and profession, would see in the same odious light! And how gladly does she depart, with a countenance no longer " sad," when the prayer of her heart has been ratified by the powerful benediction of the venerable servant of God! And how fervent would be her part in that early " worship of the Lord." with which the homeward journey of the pious household was sanctified!

Is there any thing that strikes you as singular, in the way of contrast, between the rejoicing which soon took place at Ramah, on the birth of the infant Samuel, and a widely differing scene of bereavement and desolation, predicted to take place then in the Old Testament, and realized in the New?

MARY. Let me think. Does it not say, about the nurder of the innocents by Herod, "In Ramah was there a voice heard. Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted because they are not?" But I thought they were killed at Bethlehem.

MAMA. You forget the addition, "and in all the coasts thereof," which probably included that one of the many Ramahs mentioned in Scripture, which was the residence of the Bethlehemite Elkanah.

But what was the name conferred on her child by the delighted Hannah?

Many. Samuel; what does that signify?

MAMA. "Asked of the Lord;" thereby perpetuating the memory of his being indeed the answer to prayer; an acknowledgment, we are led to suppose, also made by his grateful father, when, (in addition to his usual yearly sacrifice), it is said he offered to the Lord his "vow."

MARY. I wonder, Mama, that Hannah did not wish to go too, and thank God in his holy temple, and show her child to good Eli.

MAMA. That such would have been her inclination, we cannot doubt; but you forget the slender facilities then afforded for women in journeying, and the wise provision in the law of Moses, by which, while their attendance at the yearly festivals was permitted and approved, it was not, like that of the "males," obligatory, but dispensed with when encumbered with young children. It was from no deficiency of zeal or gratitude that Hamah tarried in Ramah, while others went to or nip at Shiloh. It was only to fit, by careful nursing, her beloved Samuel for early devotion to his God; and to fortify her own heart for the one painful effort which was to transfer him for ever from her arms and bosom, to the sanctuary of the Lord.

MARY. Surely even when "weaned" he would be too young to do without his mother.

MANA. No doubt he was still so, as is expressly said in verse 24th. But the habits of the East extend, far beyond our own, the period of nursing; nor is it uncommon in southern countries, for children still so nourished, to be running about alone. That maternal tenderness would, in Samuel's case, prolong to the uttermost the pleasing task, we may well believe; but when, at length, it was completed, do we find Hannah shrinking from the fulfilment of the yet higher duty she had voluntarily bound herself to discharge?

MARY. No, she boldly took the dear child un with her, " to bring him to the Lord, in Shiloh."

Mama. And did this "free-will offering," all precious as it was, seem sufficient in her eyes to supersede every other?

MARY. No, no; she took besides, "three bullocks, and an ephah of flour, and a bottle of wine." I suppose this last means a good quantity, in a large skin, does it not?

MAMA. Probably; from the liberality of the rest of the intended offering.

But how amply must she have been repaid, both for it and the yet more costly sacrifice she made in "not withholding her son, her only son, whom she loved, from the Lord"—when standing before His altar, she could say to his sympathizing priest, "As thy soul liveth, I am the woman that stood by thee here, praying unto the Lord. For this child I prayed, and the Lord hath given me my petition. Therefore also have I "lent," or (as it should rather be translated), "returned" him to the Lord."

MARY. Mama! Is Samuel meant when it says, "he worshipped the Lord there?" Was he not too young to do so?

MAMA. Even were there any other person to whom the words could be applied, we should feel assured (from the deep piety of Hannah), that to present and initiate her son as an infant worshipper in the sanctuary of her God, would be her care and pride before leaving Shiloh. But as, very shortly after her departure, he is represented as " ministering before the Lord, clad in a linen ephod," (or sacerdotal garment), we may conclude that, even when no longer dependent on her for mere bodily nutriment, she had retained her child till the spiritual nurture, so peculiarly a mother's province, had been in some degree administered. Indeed, had his youthful mind not been previously imbued at home with the fear and love of God, Samuel could hardly have either imbibed or cherished, amid the depravity of the household of Eli, the purity of heart, and docility of disposition, by which he was recommended at so early an age, to the special favour and revelations of the Well would it be for all children, if the nourishment derived from the maternal bosom were thus early blended with spiritual food; and if the "weaning" which reluctantly divorces them from thence, were followed up by the yet more painful but necessary effort, of denying them every indulgence inconsistent with their welfare and salvation!

But we must hasten to the inspired "Song," in which the thanksgivings of Hannah were poured out before the Lord. Is there any similar hymn in Scripture of which it forcibly reminds you?

MARY. Oh! it is almost the same as that of the mother of the Saviour, beginning, "My soul shall magnify the Lord," &c.

Yes; in exulting gratitude for the goodness of God-in triumphant celebration of his mighty power and "wonderful works among the children of men"-these inspired effusions breathe a truly kindred spirit. But while a deep sense of personal humility (proportioned to the magnitude of the honour to be conferred on her) specially characterizes the hymn of Mary, that of Hannah abounds in prophetic references, not only to her own future fertility, and the victorious character of her son's administration, but to the glory of that "far greater" King, the "anointed of the Lord," whom she enjoys the honour of being the first distinctly to name and point out. A triumphant "seed of the woman" had indeed been promised even to siming Eve—and a "prophet like unto himself," had Moses predicted would arise in due time among his brethren. But in his character of an "anointed king," no one had before Hannah been privileged to speak of Christ; not merely (like Abraham) to "see his day afar off and be glad," but communicate the glad tidings to generations unborn; for to "Messiah" is the hymn of Hannah applied, even by the unbelieving Jews themselves. Ought not this distinction, Mary, conferred by the Spirit of God on a pions female, to enhance our value for that fervent piety which formed her only qualification for the prophetic And should not the examples we have lately reviewed of virtue in "holy women of old," excite in us a laudable emulation, and a fear lest. even 2. hristians, we should "come short" of so lofty a standard? No human accomplishments, let us remember, fitted the gleaner of Moab to be a "mother of princes in Israel;" or the wife of the humble Levite of Ramah to deliver the " oracles of God." Devotion to His service, resignation to his will, and gratitude for his benefits, constituted then as now (along with the " meek and quiet spirit" which ought ever to accompany them) the chief glory and ornament of our sex.

MARY. Mama, what does Hannah mean when she says her "horn" was exalted; and that God should "exalt the horn of His anointed?"

MAMA. This very common Scripture phrase has derived much illustration from the singular custom discovered by modern travellers still to prevail in Abyssinia, where many Jewish practices are said to have been introduced by the intercourse of their famous Queen with Solomon.

Governors of provinces in that country were found by Bruce to wear round the head a broad fillet, in the centre of which rose a piece of silver gilt, about four inches long, not only exactly resembling, but called by themselves a "horn," and only worn in parades or reviews after victory; thereby elucidating in a wonderful manner the phrase of "exalting" or "lifting up" the "horn."

But we must hurry over the accounts given in the latter part of our reading, of the shamefully rapacious conduct of the sons of poor old Eli. Not content with superadding to the regular Mosaic canon (which provided amply out of the sacrifices for the support of the priests) the most arbitrary exactions, by which they disgusted and alienated the people from the service of God—they defiled His very sanctuary with scandalous sins, for which they were in vain reproved by their too indulgent and now infirm parent. By what fearful denunciation was he in his turn rebuked, for the sin (unpardonable alike in a father and a priest) of "honouring his sons above his God?"

Mary. His sons were to die young, both in one day, and they were to "cousume his eyes, and grieve his heart; and there was not to be an old man in his house for ever."

MAMA. And by what other humiliating particulars (already predicted in these words of Haunah, "he that is full shall hire himself for bread"—was the degradation of this "rejected" family to be completed?

MARY. "Every one that is left in thine house shall come and crouch for a morsel of bread, and shall say. Put me, I pray thee, into one of the priest's offices, that I may eat a piece bread."

MAMA. Yes, Mary; such was the sentence of rejective and abandonment "gone out from before the Lord" against that most iniquitous of all classes of offenders—shameless profaners of the priest-hood! To all such it holds out a terrible warning; nor can parents conside like Eli, at the wickedness of their children, without expecting to partake, in this world, of Eli's grief and mortification, and in the world to come of the stings of that remorse, which will eternally upbraid them with the misery and ruin of their offspring.

MORNING TWENTIETH.

Lesson .- I Samuel, Chapters iii. and iv.

MAMA. If we had occasion to acknowledge yesterday, with pious gratitude and humility, the honour conferred on our sex by that prophetic view of a future Saviour which rewarded the piety of Hannah, we have in to-day's reading a still more astonishing proof that the "Lord seeth not as man seeth;" and that in those spiritual things especially which belong to Him, wisdom is not always vouchsafed to men of understanding. While the investment of Samuel, almost in infancy, with the office of a prophet and reprover of God's anointed priest, sufficiently testifies, that, in the choice of his instruments, purity of heart and unhesitating obedience can compensate the want of all more ambitious qualifications; young people may draw from the early piety and docility thus signally distinguished, both the brightest example and highest encouragement. Christian children will, it is true, neither expect to be favoured (in these times of general illumination) with a special revelation from Heaven; nor will they arrogate to themselves the character, so long modestly declined, and at length so reluctantly assumed by Samuel, of a reprover of elder persons. Mary, many are the silent calls of God's Holy Spirit, to which, from the depths of a pious heart, they very daily answer, " Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth;" and many are the occasions on which the youngest among them may tacitly reprove, by their own steadiness in the right path, the follies or vices of their youthful associates. And let those who (like Samuel) have enjoyed the inestimable benefit of a mother's teaching and a mother's prayers, remember that if he would have been peculiarly unpardonable had he turned a deaf ear to the repeated summons of God-no less unpardonable will they be, if, "refusing the voice that now speaketh to them from heaven," they grow up partakers in the sins, and sharers in the doom, of the profligate or the careless.

By what circumstance was the prophetic honour conferred on Samuel, in the beginning of our chapter, peculiarly enhanced?

MARY. By the scarcity of God's word in those days. It says "there was no open vision"—what does that mean?

MAMA. That since the one vouchsafed to Manoah seventy years before, we read of no visible manifestation of the presence of Jehovah among the children of Israel; while, to the absence of such among a gross and carnal people, may perhaps in part be traced that degeneracy of the very servants of the altar, of which the continued silence of an offended God was the just punishment.

How was the long silence at length awfully broken?

MARY. By God calling to Samuel when he was lying asleep in the temple. I thought there was no temple till long after this time.

MAMA. You are right, the tabernacle is here meant, which (especially from the time of its being permanently erected at Shiloh) is frequently thus called in Scripture.

MARY. But though you explained to me (when reading about little King Joash being brought up in the temple) that there were houses within it for the priests' families, I don't quite know how the tabernacle, which you told me was only a large tent, came to be slept in by Eli and Samuel?

MAMA. Though constructed on the principle of a tent, for the convenience of frequent removals in the wilderness, the tabernacle comprised, besides its grand divisions of "outer sanctuary" and "holy of holies," various courts, within whose precincts sacrifice was offered, and which afforded lodging to the immediate ministers of the altar, among whom we have seen Samuel was now expressly enrolled.

There is something very beautiful, as well as deeply instructive, in thus viewing the old age of Eli, and the childhood of Samuel, alike reposing under the shadow of the same sacred walls, and the protection of that God, whose voice the one was about, for the first time, with pious awe to hear, and whose judgments the other was ere long, for the last time, with pious resignation, to have announced to him.

Whose call did Samuel two several times in dutiful alacrity fly to answer?

MARY. Eli's; which was very natural, for a child could never think God would speak to him.

MAMA. But all children may learn from the example of Samuel, how acceptable to God is that readiness of tilial obedience which he manifested towards one who stood to him in the place of an earthly parent. How different from the cold reluctant assent yielded to parental commands by hundreds, like the careless son in the New Testament, who said, "I go, sir, and went not"—is the starting up from the sweet sleep of youth and health of Samuel; his repeated and auxious assurances of "Here I am, for thou didst call me;" his mortification at being denied, as he thought, the privilege of serving and pleasing his aged benefactor! This, this it was which the Lord approved in Samuel, and which fitted him (when at length made aware of the higher nature of the obedience to which he was called) to sacrifice, however reluctantly, his amiable feelings towards an earthly friend, to his duty to a Heavenly Master.

How did he, instructed by the riper experience of Eli, now answer the Divine summons?

MARY. "Speak, Lord! for thy servant heareth." Mama, he must have been dreadfully afraid when he knew at length that it was God himself who called to him.

Mama. Awed, indeed, must so young a creature have felt, especially when we consider the terrible nature of the communication poured into his "tingling ear!" But for himself, it does not appear that this nestling, brought up in the "courts of God's house," indulged in any idle apprehensions. His only fear was for the effect of his tidings on the enfeebled frame and harassed feelings of the aged Eli. Had he shewn the same willingness to hurt and distress, as he had lately done to serve and please his old friend, we should have been disposed to hate instead of loving him.

What was the nature of the doom pronounced on Eli?

MARY. His house was to be "judged, and made an end of," and its iniquity was "not to be purged with sacrifice or offering, for ever."

Mama. And why was this denunciation made so fearfully irrevocable?

MARY. For the iniquity which Eli knew of —becau e " his sons made themselves vile, and he restrained them not."

MAMA. Yes, Mary; the most impressive lesson ever read in Scripture to thoughtless parents, resides in these awful words. Had Eli enforced. by wholesome restraint, the example of virtue he contented himself with setting before his children, not only would the commission of the enormities by which they polluted God's altar, and provoked His vengeance, have been rendered impossible, but the very seeds of vice to which these owed their origin would have been early stiffed; and in all probability, instead of being a "reproach and a byword," beggars and suppliants for a "piece of bread," the family of Eli, (like that of his faithful successor), would "not have wanted a man to stand before the Lord" as long as a kingdom and temple existed in Israel! And if it is heartrending to a parent to have to answer, and justly, for the temporal ruin of his children-who shall even guess at the bitterness of the remorse of those who have helped to rob their injured offspring of their place in that world where they were called to be "priests and kings before God for ever."

How was the amiable reluctance of Samuel to afflict Eli with these evil tidings at length overcome?

MARY. Eli first spoke to him kindly, and called him "my son;" and then ordered him not to hide any thing from him of what the Lord had said. It would not have been like Samuel to refuse then.

MAMA. No; the very same dutiful spirit which at first made him silent, dictated obedience now; especially when enforced in the name of that God who had so recently enrolled him in his own immediate service. Did this kind and affectionate child now soften or keep back any part of the Divine demunciation?

Many. No, no; he would not have dared; for he must have known that God could read the heart, and was the best judge of His own message.

MANA. It would be well if all, who at riper years, and with more matured experience, have undertaken to deliver its sacred tenor, were equally careful to preserve it unadulterated; and would remember the word of an inspired Apostle, "Woe is laid on me if I preach not the Gospel."

But we must return to the effect of Samuel's faithful testimony on the aged Eli. In what spirit did be receive the merited chastening of the Lord?

MARY. One cannot help being very sorry for him, he was so mild and resigned. I did not know it was his saying one so often hears quoted by pions people in affliction—" It is the Lord, let him to what seemeth Him good."

MAMA. Yes; and this expression of humble resignation is so much the more affecting, because (as we shall shortly see), it did not proceed from feelings blunted by age, but simply from a deep sense of error in himself, and acquiescence in the just judgment of God.

But, before proceeding to the melancholy catastrophe of the next chapter, what distinction do we find awaiting the early piety, and fearless obedience of Samuel?

MARY. "He grew, and the Lord was with him; and all Israel, from Dan to Beersheba, knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the Lord." Mama, this was a great honour for so young a boy!

MAMA. It was, indeed, Mary! and if (as I before remarked) our reading yesterday led us to speak of "women highly favoured of the Lord," similar honour is to-day reflected on the young, by the revelation of the "Word of God" to the child Samuel in Shiloh. But it even we, at this distance of years, can sympathise in the glorious distinction, what must have been the exulting feelings of the pious Hannah, when permitted to see the son she had devoted to the service of God, the chosen depositary of his will; and instead of an obscure Levite of Ramah, an object of reverential observance to the "many thousands of Israel!" So often do sacrifices made to a sense of duty find, even in this world, their "exceeding great reward!"

But we must hasten to the far different and more humiliating scenes recorded in our second chapter. Against whom do we find the Israelites "going out to battle?"

MARY. The Philistines, Mama; and they must surely have gone without asking Samuel, for they were miserably "smitten before them."

MAMA. Yes, we may be assured of this omission (unpardonable now, when a prophet had again been vouchsafed them) by the circumstance of their madly taking upon them to remove the ark from Shiloh; a profanation of which Samuel, young as he was, could have testified the folly as well as sinfulness.

MARY. I suppose they did it because Joshua made the ark be carried round Jericho; but then thod commanded it, and now they had no right to move it from the place where He had chosen it to remain. It did them no good, however, except frightening the Philistines.

Mama. No and like all other unauthorized invasion. "the prerogative of God, it gave occasion (by the failure of a mere human expedient, devised by rashness and presumption) for His "enemies to blaspheme." It might be natural for them (with their childish pagan notions of tutelary and local deities,) to despair of success, now that the "God of Israel" was come into the opposite camp. But for those who knew (or might have known) that He "whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain," was best invoked in the "place He had chosen to put His name there;" it was a just punishment to find that His insulted Glory was content, by a momentary eclipse in the eyes of ignorant heathens, to vindicate itself from the affront offered by His own pretended worshippers.

What was the dreadful blow inflicted for this purpose on the national pride, and mistaken "will worship" of the Israelites?

MARY. "The ark of God was taken!" Mama, I woulder He could allow this!

MAMA. And I should have wondered how it could be otherwise, consistently with that Majesty which, (by dragging, as it were, the Almighty into the field), the people had impiously striven to pledge to their unsanctioned enterprize. Better was it in His eyes, that an a uncircumcised Philistine' should enjoy a temporary triumph, than that, emboldened by success. His chosen people should have continued to make the ark of the Lord subservient to their unhallowed caprices.

But on which of the guilty copartners in the act of sacrilege, do we find special vengeance to have fallen?

MARY. On Hoplini and Phineas, Eli's sons, who were along with the ark in the camp; and who ought to have known better, and staid at Shiloh.

MAMA. And on whom rested, in all probability, the chief guilt of being accessory to its removal; as the intense anxiety for its fate, of their aged powerless parent sufficiently testified his reluctant compliance. For whom were his misgivings awakened, on first hearing the cry of distress that arose on the arrival of the messenger of mourning? Was it for his indulged and too dearly beloved sons?

MARY. Oh! no; it was for the ark of God. And when he heard it was taken, the poor old man, of ninety-eight, fell off his seat backward and died!

MAMA. Yes, Mary, under the influence of that deepest of all remorse which can visit the pious bosom; when he beheld not only the welfare of his own family, but the honour of that ark of God, entrusted to his special ministry, endangered by the effects of his own criminal connivance. Without the most grievous dereliction of his duty as a parent, and a High Priest, Lis sons could never have carried so far their usurped authority as to place in jeopardy the "oracles of God." Nor would He, for aught less than the signal chastisement of all concerned, have suffered, even for a moment, the heathen to triumph, and the ark of His "Testimony" to fall into their hands. No wonder that so awful and unheard of a misfortune swallowed up, even in the heart of a parent, the loss of his two sons!

But what were its effects on one whom their decease must have touched yet more nearly and tenderly?

MARY. It made the wife of Phineas, when she was dying, call her son "Ichabod," because the glory was "departed from Israel;" and even she seems to have thought much more of the taking of the ark, than of the deaths of her husband and father-in-law.

MAMA. Yes, to a dying woman these events would appear in their true dimensions and real colours. Nor could even the birth of a son, by which the loss of his father might be compensated, shed a ray of joy over a deathbed, embittered by the knowledge that the God to whose service his birth would naturally have devoted him, had been alienated from His people by his parents' treachery and misconduct. And let us close this lumiliating record of Israel's disgrace and discomfiture, by an instructive review of the train of misfortunes attributable to the weak infatuation of Eli.

First, the disgust and alienation occasioned among God's people by the tyranny and profligacy of his sons; the weight of personal guilt incurred by these misguided youths themselves; the transfer of the priesthood from their race to another family; the betraying of the ark by their connivance into the hands of the Philistines: their own untimely and merited deaths; and the shock which snapped in so cruel a manner the fragile thread of their old father's existence, and the tender ties which bound to life the wife of their All these disastrons consequences may be distinctly traced to the culpable negligence of Eli; and let none by whom the fatal train is followed up, hesitate to subscribe to the advice of the "wise man," "Chasten thy son while there is hope, and let not thy soul spare for his crying; for a foolish son is a grief to his father, and bitterness to her that bare him,"

MORNING TWENTY FIRST.

Lessox-1 Samuel, Chapters v. and vi.

MAMA. I think, Mary, that the memorable chapters we have just read must have gone far to remove the not unnatural surprise and concern you expressed yesterday on the ark of the Lord being suffered to fall into the hands of the Philistines. If, impressing these proud idolaters with lofty conceptions of the power of the God they habitually defied, had been (as we saw it was not) the sole object of the momentary triumph accorded them, we should now have become convinced that it was better attained by that triumph than by the most signal victory of the Israelites; so that, had the punishment of the latter been wholly out of the question, the vindication of Jehovah's honour was effectually secured.

It is probable that the ignorant heathens, whose panic at the arrival of the ark in the camp of Israel arose from some superstitions belief in its efficacy as a charm or symbol—hoped, by its capture and transference to themselves, to ensure the very benefits it had failed to confer on their enemies: just as the foolish king of Israel (of whom we once read) imported and set up those very gods of Damascus who had been powerless to deliver their own worshippers from his victorious arms. There is nothing too stupid or absurd to be freely admitted by those whose understanding has once been brought to seek safety and protection from stocks and stones; and so far from wondering, as many do, at the inconsistencies of idolaters, that word alone seems an epitome of all the folly and perversion of which the human mind is capable.

What proof does the narrative afford that the capture of the ark (the supposed tutelary deity of the Israelites) did not prevent the conquerors from still regarding it as an object of fear and worship?

MARY. They put it into the very house of Dagon, and set it up beside him. What an insult to the true God!

MAMA. Yes, in reality; but not thus intended, by those who were too blind to discern the difference. Do you know any particulars characteristic of this Philistine idol?

MARY. No.

MAMA. Its name signifies a "fish," which

(with a human head and shoulders) its lower parts reser ale 1; a form probably adopted for their idol by a maritime people, from some superstition, not yet an irely cradicated, about mermen, or supernatural beings, half-fish half-man. But is this the first time that Dagon and his worship have come under our notice?

MARY. No, no: one would think Sampson's pulling down his temple in the strength of the God of the Jews would have made the Philistines afraid enough of Him!

MAMA. True; and it was not superstitious from of the God of Israel in which they were now deficient; but that rational discernment of the Creator of the universe from the meanest workmanship of their own hands, which, at this dark period, the most signal judgments failed to communicate to the benighted mind of man. Did the prostrate and mutilated condition of their national deity at all open their eyes to the tremendous difference?

MARY. No, they first tried to set Dagon up again; and when all broken to pieces, instead of throwing the useless bits away, they only left off going across the threshold on which he had fallen. Why so?

MAMA. Because, with inconceivable stupidity, they seem to have considered the threshold hallowed by the very humiliation of their prostrate divinity; and so pertinaciously did they adhere to this childish notion, that a prophet of Israel (centuries after) designates the worshippers of Dagon by the title of "those that leap on the threshold."

But was Jehovah content with a mortification which their besotted minds forbade them to comprehend?

MARY. No; "His hand was heavy upon them of Ashdod, and he destroyed them and smote them, with emerods, even Ashdod and the coasts thereof."

MAMA. This last expression confirms what we said of its being a maritime district. Ashdod (called in the New Testament Azotus) was a port between Gaza and Joppa. What the precise disease was with which God afflicted its inhabitants, learned men have not discovered; but it must have been grievous, from their anxiety to get rid of the ark, its acknowledged cause.

MARY. If they knew it was the ark that brought all the harm upon them, why did they not pray to the God it belonged to, to cure them? or send it home at once?

MAMA. Just because rational conduct is (as we before remarked), nowhere found in fellowship with gross idolatry. Those Philistines who could unhesitatingly exalt the God of even the vanquished Israelites into equality with Dagon, had not sense (when the fellowship was indignantly spurned and the idol annihilated) to transfer to the victorious God of the Hebrews, their homage and their hearts; and, even when smarting under his continued indignation, contented themselves with stifting the evil from city to city, instead of averting it by penitence and submission. Were it not that the expedients daily resorted to among ours dives to escape the punishment of sin without time the conce to the sole of fountain opened for its care, partook of the same, or worse inconsistency—we might have a better right to wonder at the folly manifested by the sufferers of Ashdod.

What was the result of the removal of the ark to Gath?

MARY. Oh! the same, as might have been expected. "The hand of the Lord was against the city with a very great destruction." No wonder the people of Ekron cried out (when it came to them next), that they had brought the ark of the God of Israel, "to slay them and their people!"

MAMA. Strange! that it never occurred to any one that it might be converted by prayer and submission into an instrument of healing and safety! There is something to us very striking in seeing the visible symbol of the power of the God of Heaven and Earth, thus hunted from place to place, like an "accursed thing;" bringing death and desolation instead of "healing under its wings;" did it not remind us of the awful, nay we might, alas! almost say hateful aspect, under which God is obstinately viewed by those who (regarding him as an enemy), still say, "We will not have the Lord to reign over us."

What natural determination did the universal calamity occasioned in the land by the presence of the ark, at length lead to?

MARY. What they ought to have done at first—to send it away to its own place.

MAMA. How long had it remained a "terror to the evil doers" of that most deeply corrupted of heathen lands?

MARY. Seven months; till all the people had either died or been very ill. I am sure they needed no priests or diviners to teach them to get rid of it.

MAMA. No; but they sent for such to instruct them how to dismiss it acceptably; one slight symptom of the salutary and humbling effects of continued affliction. They never thought, till now, of propitiating the offended God of the Israelites. How was this to be done?

MARY. Even the heathen priests advised them to send a trespass-offering, "that they might be healed, and his hand removed." This was surely acknowledging His power at least. MAMA. Yes, as a rival, and for the present conquering deity; but with no conversion of the understanding to His supremacy, or of the heart to His service. Thus do the "devils believe and tremble;" and careless professing Christians banish the God they cannot altogether deny. But what singular offering did slavish fear suggest to the humbled lords of the Philistines?

MARY. A very strange one! golden images of the "cmerods," (whatever they were), that had killed so many of them; and "golden mice." What could the meaning of either be?

Mama. Strange as the former part of the transaction may appear to you, it was not only customary among the ancients to dedicate in their temples symbols of any diseases or deliverances they had experienced, but Catholic churches are hung round to this day with votive offerings, representing frequently diseased limbs, supposed to have been miraculously restored to soundness; while, in sea-port towns, models of ships in silver, or other materials, are suspended in gratitude for escape from shipwreck.

As for the "mice," besides appropriately denoting the numbers in which we are told they had "marred the land, and consumed its fruits," they had (as we learn from heathen authors), a peculiar sanctity ascribed to them for "lustration," or cleansing.

Many. I shall never wonder at this again, now you have made it all so clear; but I never can cease wondering that the Philistine priests should talk so sensibly to their countrymen about not "hardening their hearts like Pharaoh," and remembering all God had done to him, and yet remain idolaters all the time themselves!

MAMA. God forbid you should cease to wonder, Mary, at the fearful want of connexion still existing in the human mind between apparent religious knowledge and real practical religiou. Many can talk scripturally with their lips, nay strenuously advise others to "give glory unto the God of Israel," while their own hearts remain as far from him as those of the unconverted followers of Dagon.

But what singular mode did these soothsayers suggest for removing the doubts which yet lingered in their minds, as to the miraculous agency of the God they had been "honouring with their lips?"

Many. If the two milch cows which had never drawn a cart before, and had their calves shut up at home, went back to them (as was quite natural), instead of going straight to Beth-shemesh, then they were to know it was "not God who smote them, but all a chance that happened unto them." Mama, they might have known there was no such thing as chance in the world.

MAMA. Be thankful that you know it, and still more so, that it is a God of grace and mercy, on whom depend the minutest as well as most momentons events in this world's history! But the test proposed by the diviners of Ekron, though betraying unbelief, was abundantly conclusive. Could any thing, think you, (short of Divine guidance), impel two unbroken animals, yoked together for the first time, unhesitatingly to leave their affsoring behind, and ("lowing" with satisfaction "as they went along,) to hold the placid tenor of their way along the strange "coasts" of Judea, to the unknown city of Beth-shemesh?

MARY. No, certainly. I am glad God condescended to make this so plain to the Philistine lords who followed.

MAMA. To his own honour this undoubtedly redounded, though alas! not (that we read of) to their conviction or amendment. But how was the return of the long lost national palladium hailed by the inhabitants of Beth-shemesh?

MARY. They rejoiced to see it; and I am glad the Philistine lords saw them offer a burnt-offering with the wood of the very cart, and the cows that drew it, before they returned to their own land.

MAMA. Such a suitable and grateful mode of welcoming back among them the precious symbol which their folly had polluted, certainly spoke well for the reviving piety and penitence of those into whose hands it first came. Well would it have been for them, had the holy fear and reverrence testified by their original reception of it, continued to influence them! By whose privileged hands, did you observe, was it lifted from the cart?

MARY. By the Levites: no one else, you know, was allowed by God to touch it.

MAMA. And how was neglect of this special injunction fearfully visited?

MARY. With a dreadful judgment, Mama! and one that seems terribly severe for just looking into the ark to see if all was right within it.

Mama. We have no reason to imagine the motives of the offenders so landable as you suppose; but even had it been so, the positive commands of God are, in no instance, to give place to the arrogant officiousness of His creatures. To the Lord did it belong to rectify and arrange whatever of disorder or dilapidation His ark might have suffered from Philistine outrage; less intolerable in His eyes than the presumptuous curiosity of his miscalled servants. The chastisement with which the latter were visited may seem, at first sight, severe; but it is by no means a solitary instance of that holy a jealousy? with which it has pleased the Almighty to fence round, from unhallowed hands and eyes, the precincts of His sanctuary. Even Levites (the chosen ministers of the altar) were forbidden, on pain of death, to pry into the sacred contents of the ark: therefore those of the rabble of Bethshemesh who took upon themselves to do so, could not be said to perish unwarned. But this being premised, it may be a satisfaction to you to learn, that out of the 'ty thousand persons drawn together by enriosity from Beth-shemesh and the neighbouring country, only seventy men are supposed to have been partakers in the sin or its punishment; the more exact translation appearing to be-" out of fifty thousand, threescore and ten men." As there is no probable ground for supposing that fifty thousand individuals could have committed the offence, so it is more consonant to the strict method of God, in avenging similar transgressions, that the offenders only should have been marked out as the victims of their sacrilege; seventy of whom, from the scanty population of a single village, would sufficiently attest the indignation, and vindicate the Majesty of Heaven. We are corroborated in this lenient interpretation by "seventy" being the number expressly mentioned by the Jew Josephus, as having perished on this memorable occasion.

But what salutary effect had even this mitigated chastisement on the Beth-shemites?

MARY. They said, "Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God?" But I think they were as bad as the Philistines; for, instead of keeping the ark, and reverencing it properly, they only thought of sending it away.

MAMA. Yes: as many are in the daily practice of "putting far from them" a God too holy for their taste, and too formidable for their comfort. The resource on such occasions is, alas! obvious and easy; it is that of the Bethshemites, who, because the God of Israel might not be offended with impunity, said to Him, "Depart from us, for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways."

There are few passages of Scripture history, Mary, more practically instructive than the one we have this day read; descriptive of the migrations, amid ignorant enemies and pretended friends, of the abused, and undervalued, and trampled testimony of God. Among the Philistines it came "mighty in word and in power," to the "casting down" of the prostrate deities of paganism, and "making a shew of them openly." Yet, in the face of the most irresistible demonstration, it was rejected, bandied from place to place, and, finally, (though with diminished audacity), exiled from the land it might have healed and saved.

And what was its reception, even on the more favoured soil of God's own land of promise? Hailed with outward tokens of respect, and an object of temporary rejoicing, no sooner did it manifest itself as an "avenger of transgression"as something too holy to be trifled with-than " Let us alone, what have we to do with thee. became the universal cry among a people "choosing darkness rather than light, because their deeds were cvii, and content to forego (rather than be reminded of His existence), the proud distinction and inexpressible privileges conferred on a nation by the presence of that God, of whose residence among them in the same character of "Emmanuel." their guilty descendants showed themselves yet more unworthy.

MORNING TWENTY-SECOND.

LESSON-1 Samuel, Chapters vii. and viii.

MAMA. In the two chapters which, in hastening to the termination of the Theocracy, or divine government of Israel by Judges, we have read to-day—we have the most instructive, though painful proofs of the fallibility and inconsistency of human nature; first, in even the sons of Samuel proving obnoxious to God and man for the same enormities which had displaced from the priest-hood the posterity of Eli; and, secondly, in the wayward ingratitude with which the too highly favoured Israelites threw from them the honour and privilege of direct Divine supremacy, and exclaimed, in defiance of prohibitions and warnings, "Nay, but we will have a king to reign over us!"

What apparently sincere acts of humiliation and repentance, recorded in the earlier part of our chapters, made this impious demand particularly inconsistent?

Mary. When the ark had been twenty years at Kirjath-jearim, it says "All the house of Israel lamented after the Lord." Why did they lament now, when the ark was safe back in their own country?

Mama. Not without reason, as the address of Samuel testifies; since, potwithstanding the long residence among them of the hallowed symbol of God's presence, it appears that "gods many, and lord many," shared as completely with Jehovah the Alegiance of Israel, as Dagon had been set up in rivalry with Him by the ignorant Philistines. That the continued oppressions of the latter people were at the bottom of the generally selfish lamentations of the "house of Israel," we may gather from Samuel's assurance, that if they would " return unto the Lord with all their hearts," He would deliver them out of the hand of the Philistines. And with the view only of temporal relief, there is reason to fear the extorted reformation may have taken place. Had it been genuine, and founded on pious gratitude, it is impossible to suppose its issue would so soon after, have been dissatisfaction with God's government, and revolt against His authority.

MARY. What does it mean that the people, when gathered at Mizpeh, "drew water and poured it out before the Lord;" as well as fasted, and confessed their sins?

MAMA. Learned men are not quite agreed as to the precise nature of this symbolic action, some supposing it to refer to the purification of heart and life indispensible to sincere repentance. But the greater part imagine, that as Samuel had just promised them a signal temporal deliverance, the water was poured out in rejoicing at the prospect of it; as was the annual custom at the feast of tabernacles, when commemorating the goodness and bounty of God; to which Isaiah alludes when he says. "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation."

But do you recollect any passage in the New Testament, in which reference yet more distinct is made to the custom of drawing, and gratuitously distributing water at the conclusion of a great Jewish festival?

MARY. I don't remember any.

MAMA. Do we not read in the Gospel, that it was on the "last day of the feast" that our Lord stood and cried (availing himself as usual of surrounding circumstances) "If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink—come, buy without money and without price"—thus indicating at once the freeness and joyful nature of the Gospel salvation; in which not water merely, (precious as it was in the parched lands of the east), but the costlier refreshments of wine and milk are indiscriminately poured forth?

But had all their fastings, humiliations, or even subsequent rejoicings, sufficed to inspire the Israelites with that faith in God, which, when testified by obedience, is better than "whole burnt offerings and sacrifices?"

MARY. No; with God and Samuel on their side, the cowardly creatures were still afraid of the Phin sines.

MAMA. It is to be hoped that the fear in this instance, proceeded rather from an awakened sense of their own unworthiness, than from distrust of God's power or goodness; from their earnest entreaties to Samuel to be their intercessor with Him.

By what peculiarly appropriate offering was their sinfulness acknowledged and atoned?

MARY. By a "lamb," which Samuel offered for a burnt offering "wholly to the Lord."

MAMA. I am not sure (from our temporary omission of the details of the Jewish ceremonial law), whether you are aware of the full force of the latter expression; that it was the usual distinction of a sin-offering (or atonement for national or individual transgression), to be entirely consumed on the altar of Jehovah; while of "peace" or "free-will offerings," portions were reserved for the consumption of the priests, and of the pious donors themselves.

What occurred, while Samuel was thus employed, to testify the acceptableness of the appointed sacrifice?

MARY. The Lord himself "thundered with a great thunder on the Philistines, and discomfited them." I am sure, Mama, a God that could do that, was better to the Israelites than twenty Kings!

MAMA. Aye, Mary, after such a signal display of Omnipotence, their choice of a mere human ruler, a man of like weaknesses, and "like passions" with themselves, does indeed seem puerile and preposterous! But let not those by whom the tyramy of the world and Satan is deliberately preferred to the "free service" and "easy yoke" of Christ—imagine themselves entitled to scoff at the childish conduct of the Israelites in "desiring a King."

Was this victory, achieved by Divine might alone—temporary, like many previous successes of the children of Israel?

MARY. No, no; the Philistines "were subdued, and came no more into the coast of Israel;" and they had to give back the very cities they had taken.

MAMA. Let us learn from this impressive fact, the widely differing nature of the final and permanent victory over our spiritual enemies achieved for every one of us by our Lord, and in the "power of his might"—from the slight and doubtful advantages which (in our own strength) any of us have ever been able to gain over the corruptions of buman nature. A Sanson himself may rise to combat the "strong man armed" within—by a vigorous effort the pillars of his iniquitous shrine may even be temporarily shaken—but God must "thunder mightily," and himself discomfit the ever rising host of sinful passions and desires, before (like th Philistines) they can be for ever "subdued;" and "come no more" into the purified precincts of the "swept and garnished" heart.

How did Samuel expressively commemorate this seasonable interposition of the Lord?

Mary. He set up "a stone," (a pillar I suppose) and called it "Eben-ezer." What did that mean?

MAMA. The "stone of help," as we read in the margin. Indeed the object is sufficiently explained by the words of Samuel, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped me;" and many are the similar memorials which, in the course of his earthly pilgrimage, might be "set up" in the heart, and recorded in the life and conversation of the Christian!

How long is it here said that Samuel " judged Israel?"

MARY. "All the days of his life." It seems odd to say so of him, when we know that he lived long after he had given the people the King they were so anxious for.

Mama. True; and therefore, instead of having any thing to do with the duration of his government, the expression properly refers to his unwearied diligence in the exercise of it; and should have been translated "cvery day of his life." Was this good and active ruler content with remaining in one place, and allowing all who required justice to resort to him—like Deborah and others we read of?

Many. No; he went a regular circuit every year through a great many cities; and "judged Israel" in all those places.

MAMA. From whence, I daresay, was originally borrowed the humane and considerate practice of modern times, by which justice is annually, or oftener, made to circulate throughout every district of our country. But where did Samuel fix its principal seat in Israel, and his own residence?

MARY. At Ramah, which was very natural; for you know he was born there.

MAMA. And by what pious act did he take care to hallow the place of his nativity?

MARY. He "built there an altar to the Lord."

MAMA. Yes; not only as a token of pious gratitude, (never omitted where they set up their eartily rest,) by the believing patriarchs, but as an indispensible requisite for the delivery of those oracles, which, through him, the Lord now youch-safed to His inquiring people.

Lie hew were Samuel's own parental hopes, and I think, we may almost venture to conclude, solicitudes also, lamentably frustrated?

Marv. By his sons "not walking in his ways, but taking bribes, and perverting judgment." Mama, if they were such bad men, how could be think of appointing them Judges?

MAMA. You forget the blinding influence of partiality on the best of parents; besides which, it was perhaps only elevation to eminent stations which gave rise to, or drew forth the love of "filthy lucre" in these young men. Many who might have passed unblameably through an bumble condition, have had cause to rue the day when temptation's golden bait seduced them from the path of rectitude. All through the east to this day, the practice of "taking bribes to pervert judgment," unhappily prevails in the most open and shameless degree. But what effect, more fatal still than their personal ruin, had the misconduct of Samuel's sons on the people they thus iniquitously "judged?"

MARY. It gave them an excuse to ask for a King; but I daresay if the wish had not been at the bottom of their hearts, Samuel would have removed his sons, and given them better Judges.

MAMA. No doubt he would; and bitterly was his mistaken lenity towards them punished, when he saw it made the occasion of a request which "displeased Samuel," chiefly because he knew it to be eminently displeasing to God.

To whom did the old man turn for counsel in this cruel emergency?

MARY. To the Lord; and He saw through it at once, and said, "They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them."

Mama. And does this all-seeing and justly offended God direct His servant to punish the rebels, by denying their insulting petition?

MARY. No; instead of being angry, He desires Samuel to "hearken to their voice!"

MAMA. And are you sure that His doing so was at all inconsistent with that "righteous anger," in which the same God granted " for their hurt," many a former rash desire of his people in the wilderness? Were the quails there sent, to satisfy with flesh the unthankful "loathers" of manna—a boon from the Lord—or mere harbingers of the pestilence that swept their impious consumers away, while the food they had covered was yet "between their teeth?" Just as the final measure of Almighty wrath against the idolatry of Ephraim, was filled up by the fearful expression of "Let him alone"—so no punishment more appropriate could have been devised for despisers and rejectors of Divine dominion, than a transfer to the every of a succession of human rulers: the best of them weak and wayward; the greater part tyrannical and blood-thirsty; in short, "like unto the kings of the nations round about," after whom the chosen subjects of the Most High impiously and foolishly hankered?

But great as was the insult, and justly as it would have been resented by allowing them to rush headlong into the miseries they had provoked—did He whose name is Compassion, suffer them to cast Him off, unremonstrated with and unwarned?

MARY. Oh! no; he bade Samuel "protest solemnly unto them," and tell them exactly all they had to expect. If the kings of those days did all that he said they would do, how could the Israelites be foolish enough to desire one?

MAMA. So far from exaggerating, it is probable that Samuel did not describe, in half their enormity, the caprices and exactions of those barbarons monarchs of the surrounding nations, whom the children of Israel unnaturally "desired." In Eastern countries (at this day of comparative civilization), not only are the menial employments about the royal person here enumerated, meanly coveted, in preference to an honest independencebut the persons as well as property of their subjects are at the unlimited disposal of despotic sovereigns; whose wanton disregard of life (as in the case of modern Persia and Turkey, where piles of human heads not unfrequently adorn the courts of the Sultan), makes every one accustomed to the laws and safety of Europe, both shudder and rejoice. At the mere nod of one of these rulers (nay of those among them who are not regarded as peculiarly sanguinary) the sword or bow-string cuts off, in a moment, the highest persons in the state; while deprivation of the blessing of sight is almost the certain lot of all whom relationship to the throne renders objects of the slightest suspicion. These and similar facts, with which profane history abounds, may teach us to estimate (even more fully than the softened enumeration of Samuel), the infatuation of the Israelites in "desiring a king."

But did even personal experience of the cruelty of such "task-masters" as Pharaoh in Egypt, or Eglon king of Moab, or Jabin king of Hazron, under whom they had recently grouned—did the pitying remonstrances of God, or the passionate pleadings of Samuel, suffice to check the national freezy?

MARY. No, no, they said. "We will have a king, that we may be like unto all the nations, that our king may judge us, and go out before us, and fight our battles."

Malia. And had the "King of kings," whom they rejected, "failed in one jot or tittle" of all these acts of rightful supremacy?

MARY. Oh! no, no; he had "raised them up judges," without number, and made them strong and wise for their sakes. He had "gone out before them" in a pillar of fire, and fought their "battles," better than a thousand kings could have done!

Mama. Where then, do you think, are we to look for their unfounded preference of a fallible earthly sovereign over the "Lord God of Hosts?" Just in the same "evil heart of unbelief," which could find room for Baal, and Ashtaroth, and Chemosh; to the exclusion of the "Lord who brought them up out of the land of Egypt," and gave them every blessing the wildest imagination could desire! Because the worship of Jehovah in His sanctuary, had less in it of show, and of appeals to the senses, than the idle and generally impure rites of paganism, it was daily deserted by them for what St Paul calls "the table of devils." And because the temporal dominion of the "King in Jeshurun," (like the "wind" which He commissions, and which " goeth forth where it listeth, and no one knoweth whence it cometh or whither it goeth"), was invisible in its splendours to the grovelling eye of sense, they chose rather to bask for a moment in the treacherons sunshine of royal favour; at the risk of atoning, at every moment by their lives, for the degradation they had voluntarily courted. The choice seems to us absurd and preposterous; but are there none among ourselves, in whose eyes and hearts the tinsel of an earthly court, dims and eclipses the eternal brightness of that city of our King, which "hath no need of the sun to enlighten it," and whose splendours mortal imagery is tasked in vain to express, and which human language fails to pourtray, ever " through a glass darkly?"

There is one principle very evident in the conduct of the Jews, against which (as peculiarly dangerous to young persons) it may be well to take this apportunity of warning you. I mean the propensity towards idle imitation of unworthy or unsuitable models. Were the "nations round about," under whose yoke Israel had so often groaned, so distinguished for national worth or prosperity, as to make being " like unto them," a rational object of desire?

MARY. No; for since God thought them unfit to live, they must have been shockingly sinful, and of course very unhappy.

MAMA. Apply these two tests, then, Mary, (suggested by yourself), to the conduct and circumstances of all whom, in after life, you may feel disper d to envy or imitate. If they are "lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God," they cannot, whatever may be the outward glare of their prosperity, be intrinsically happy; nor would a child of God act otherwise than the foolish short-sighted Israelites, in "desiring" to "enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season;" in preference to the holy security and "safe-keeping" vouchsafed him by a gracious Master here, and the joys laid up in store for him at the right hand of God!

MORNING TWENTY-THIRD.

LESSON-1 Samuel, Chapters ix, and x, to verse 17.

Mama. The consideration of the chapters we have this day been reading, scarcely entered into my original plan of terminating our present course of Scripture study, with the close of that highly favoured period during which the Israelites flourished under the direct government of God. But the formal resignation (into the hands of Him by whom it was bestowed,) of the delegated authority of Samuel—and his unanswerable appeal as to the equity of its exercise on his own part, to the people over whom he had so long presided-occurred subsequently to his privately anointing Saul to the kingly office; and as the government of Israel by judges could not be said to cease until that resignation, and the open assumption of royal authority by the young herdsman of Benjamin-I have taken advantage of it to shew you (from the opening of his singular history) how widely different from the ordinary procedure of mankind, was the selection by God of that monarch whom his ungrateful subjects had "desired."

One of their great and avowed objects (as we have seen) in rejecting the sway of "Him who is invisible," was to be "like unto the nations round about;" to have, like them, an earthly ruler, nobly born, dazzling with gold and splendour, and fitted, by his renown and experience in arms, to "go out before them and fight their battles." In what respects did these requisites correspond with the birth and station of Saul?

MARY. Not so ill with his birth, Mama; for it says his father was a "mighty man of power."

MAMA. This must have related to his bodily strength or stature; for Saul, not prone to depreciate himself, says his family was "the least of all the families of Benjamin." Nor (though the humble occupation of a herdsman was not then altogether disdained by the younger sons of even wealthy parents) does his personal search for the stray asses of his father augur much for his importance in the primitive household. In his lofty stature and goodly person alone, resided those external qualifications for sovereignty, which, in the unlettered regions of the east, so often supply the want of hereditary rank on intrinsic merits.

Mary. I wonder, Mama, that when God condescended to choose the Israelites a king himself, he did not give them a pattern one, just to shew what a king should be, and not a young rash head-strong lad like Saul.

MAMA. You surely do not bear in mind what we remarked yesterday, that it was in judgment God granted their sinful prayer for a temporal ruler; and that the unvarying declarations of His word must have "fallen to the ground," had a person exempt from the peculiar vices of sovereignty (supposing such an one to have existed) been set over them to mock and falsify it. "He who doeth all things well," did not (on the other hand) see fit to vindicate his own honour by setting over them a monster of wickedness and tyranny, such as their subsequent annals have frequently exhibited; but a fair average compound of barbarian valour and barbarian vices, such as could then be culled from among the lower ranks of an uncultivated people; brave enough to dazzle for a while the nation he lived to degrade and oppress-and sufficiently wayward in temper and disposition to make them regret, a thousand times, the mild paternal sway of the God they had rejected.

How was the young wandering herdsman directed to the prophet appointed to anoint him?

MARY. By what seemed a mere chance; because his servant thought Samuel might be able to help them to the lost asses!

MAMA. Strange indeed was that arrangement of Providence which sent him, instead of recovering a trifling loss, to be invested with a kingdom; and joyful must indeed have seemed its result to Saul 'Yet who can doubt, that, on his thorny throne—deserted of God—his kingdom "fallen from him"—and his mind exposed, in a peculiar manner, to the gloomy assaults of the evil one—he lived to deem, in the bitterness of his soul, his throne dearly purchased, even at the price of that "fourth part of a shekel of silver," which first enabled him to appear in the presence of the "seer?"

Why was this trifling present indispensible in his eyes, and those of his servant, before consulting Samuel?

MARY. You have often told me that none could go empty-handed to ask a favour. What a mean idea this gives us of the great men of those days!

MAMA. Not of those days only, for the practice prevails in the same countries still. But we must not condemn rashly, on the strength of a primitive custom, originally indicative merely of respect. Do you recollect any prophet of God, as much superior to bribery in its most tempting form, as Samuel must have felt himself to the worthless coin of the young enquirer of Benjamin?

MARY. Oh! yes, you know Elijah would have nothing to do with the rich gifts of Naaman; and even Balaam pretended at first he could not disobey God for a "house full of gold;" nor would he, if he had been a right prophet.

MAMA. True, Mary, real godliness is proof against the shocking vice of bribery; and accordingly it is (at least in its more open forms) in a great measure banished from all countries where Christianity prevails.

MARY. Mama! I see a thing here which rather surprises me—Samuel seems to have been sacrificing in a "high place" when Saul found him. I thought "high places" were expressly ordered by God to be taken away.

MAMA. I am very well pleased with the attention shewn by this remark to what occurred in our former reading; though the decree and its execution rather refers to that subsequent part of the Jewish history, when such elevated sites had been perverted to the worship of false gods. In vindication of Sannel, we must observe, that though he had set up an altar at Ramah, whither the people chiefly resorted for counsel, yet that Shiloh being now desolate, and no fixed place appointed for the permanent worship of God—sacrifice might, not unlawfully, be offered in any city, the most conspicuous spot in which would naturally be selected for the purpose; and such, and such only seems to have been the "high place" here mentioned as frequented by Samuel. From his coming to this city (apparently at a stated time) to sanctify with his presence and solemn rites the public festivity, it has been supposed he had the cultivation of true religion, as well as the dispensing of justice in view, in his frequent circuits throughout Israel; and some have even referred to him the appointment and diffusion of synagogue worship among the Jews. That the rite here engaged in by Samuel was countenanced and approved by God, is evident from his accompanying it by a special revolation of his will. was this?

MARY. That He would send him "a man out of the land of Benjamin, to be anoisted captain over Israel," and to fight for his people against the Philistines. How good of God to give them a "captain," though they had just rejected the "Lord of Hosts!"

MAMA. Yes, just like Him whose "compassions are infinite," and on whose ear the "cry," even of sinners and rebels, seldom falls in vain! But even in the midst of "mercy" there is yet a calling to mind of "judgment;" for we are told that the word used by God of Saul, and translated "reigning" over His people, indicates in the original a much harsher and more absolute control; and would be more properly (though still inadequately) rendered by "restraining" or "subduing" them.

But how unconscious alike of the great destinies awaiting him in the counsels of God, or even of the presence of His prophet, does Saul appear, when inquiring his way to the latter, of the very " seer" himself! And how primitive and simple is the answer of the dispenser of kingdoms, and depositary of the will of the Most High! " I am the seer;" and his invitation to the future king of Israel to partake his hospitality; and the circumstances of the patriarchal banquet! It is in reading (and in the inimitable language of scripture) such traits as these, that we are transported as it were to the times and countries to which they relate, and are enabled to peruse with tenfold relish the narratives of modern travellers in the east; by which they have been (especially of late) almost daily corroborated. An Arab Emir would at this day invite to just such a repast, and treat with just such distinctions, the European guest whom he "delighted," (after his homely fashion.) " to honour."

MARY. Mama! I understand (since you explained about Hannah's "worthy portion,") why Joseph gave Benjamin more to eat than the rest, as a mark of favour; but why was the "shoulder" set before Saul? And what is meant by "that which was upon it?"

Mama. The "shoulder" (of a lamb especially) was so prized in the east as to be esteemed. Josephus tells us, a "royal portion;" which accounts for it- hating been prophetically "reserved" for Saul. And it is there served up covered, or, as we should say, smothered in butter and milk; thus explaining the addition with you were naturally puzzled.

MARY. I see now that the roof of a house (as you said when speaking about Rahab) might sometimes be a private place enough, since Samuel chose it for "communing" with Saul.

MAMA. The probability is that for the same reason, viz. its privacy, as well as superior coolness, his youthful guest passed the night there; and it is consonant to the primitive character of the whole scene, that, at the "spring of the day," (so precious and beautiful is the parching east) the present and future rulers of Israel should have taken their way on foot from the city together.

MARY. Why did Samuel send the servant away before anointing Saul? Did the Lord not mean it to be known yet?

Mama. No; else He would not so far have condescended to the customs and prejudices of a carnal people, as to manifest and ratify, by the public ceremony of casting lots, that private choice of Saul, now intimated to him and Samuel only by the typical act of anointing.

MARY. It was very generous and kindly in Samuel to "kiss" Saul, when he knew he was made head over the people instead of him and his sons! Some people would have been jealous and envied him.

Mama. It is refreshing to see how superior true religion cuables fallible mortals to rise above the baser passions of our nature. Even Eli could cherish with unimpaired affection the infant Samuel, destined to rise on the fall of himself and his guilty race; and, from the moment that the Divine permission (if not approbation) had sanctioned the appointment of a king—Samuel's warm heart seems to have hailed in Saul the future champion of his beloved country.

By what minute predictions, regarding the events of his homeward journey, did he seek to confirm the wondering youtly's faith in the reality of the transaction?

MARY. He told him all that would happen; and, first, his being to meet three men at "Rachel's grave." How was it known so long after, Mama, when Canaanites had lived in the country?

MAMA. Have you forgotten that Jacob's fond affection raised a pillar on that spot, on the confines of Benjamin, where (in sudden and fatal wayfaring "travail") his beloved Rachel died; far from the Cave of Machpelah, the purchased resting place of her kindred?

MARY. I remember it now; and the pillar, I daresay, was set up to make the Israelites do so too v.hen they returned to Capaan.

M.MA. Was there any yet more striking similar memorial connected with the next stage in Saul's journey—Bethel?

MARY. Oh! yes, that was where God Himself appeared to Jacob and gave him all the promises; and Jacob, I remember, on that account first called it Bethel. So when we read the other day about the people of Judah taking it and calling it "Bethel" instead of "Luz," they were only giving it back Jacob's name once more.

MAMA. Yes, Mary, and delightful it must, or ought to have been, to the chosen people, thus to gather up, and re-consecrate, the pious landmarks "set up" for them in the earthly Canaan, by those "strangers and sojourners" long since passed into a "more enduring rest." Well had it been for them had they inherited, along with the monuments, the faith of these believing patriarchs!

But what occurrence, more singular far than the ordinary ones which preceded it, was to testify to Saul, as well as others, that the Lord had indeed "given him another heart?"

MARY. He was to meet with and prophesy along with a whole "company of prophets." I did not think that there had ever been so many at one time.

MAMA. Not if you understand the phrase of "seers," or persons endowed, like Samuel, with the power of foretelling events. But "prophesying" here, and in other parts of Scripture (where the "sons of the prophets" or large bodies of youths set apart for the study and teaching of Scripture are mentioned,) signifies endowment with a facility not before possessed, of composing and uttering hymns to the praise of God; and so entirely was this gift at variance with the previous life and known attainments of Saul, that the wonder it excited has passed into a proverb.

Nor was the inspiration thus afforded—though widely different, as we lately remarked, from either the prophetic spirit, or that far higher and more precious influence, by which the heart and character of man does indeed undergo a spiritual and saving change—confined to the gift of suitably praising God. It taught a naturally rash and vain-glorious youth, that rare exercise of discretion by which, when straitly questioned by his nearest relatives on the result of his interview with Samuel (curiosity respecting which had probably been excited by the sending forward of the servant), he told not one word of that "matter of the kingdom," in the prospect of which we are sure his "natural heart" must have beat high and proudly.

Well would it have been for him had the same modest reserve and deference to Divine wisdom and authority characterized his future career; and if (even when by his own arrogance and folly, the kingdom, by the decree of the Most High, had passed from him and his race.) he had bowed under the stroke with the hamility of Eli and Samuel; instead of persecuting and defying the Lord's anointed, and closing in "envy, malice, and all uncharitableness," a reign, which we have just seen opened amid kindliness and blessing on the one part, and becoming obedience and humility on the other.

MORNING TWENTY-FOURTH.

LESSON-1 Sannel, Chapter x. from verse 17, and Chapter

Mama. I purposely reserved for the commencement of a new day's reading, that solemn recapitulation of all the benefits of God, and their ungrateful requital by his chosen people, by which the public inauguration of the king they madly desired, was ushered in by Jehovah; that we may have an opportunity of seeking and finding instruction for ourselves from the long course of national evils to which the "rejection" they are here justly reproached with of God, involved the guilty Israelites. It is not by them alone, believe me Mary, that the God who " saved them out of all their adversities and tribulations," is, to this day, rejected and despised; and when we compare even these (great and many as they were) with the "tribulation and auguish" and "eternal death," from which Christ, our rightful King, died to set us free, how can we expect to escape better than the rebellious Jews, if we shake off the only government which ever promised us either peace or safety. Twice in their history did God proffer to them the firm yet paternal sway of Omnipotence; in his character of the Lord of Hosts, and as Messiah promised to their fathers; and twice did the infatuated nation exclaim, "We will not have thee to reign over us." We blame, nay shudder at their infatuation; but "Dost thou well to be angry?" may be the searching question of the same Omniscient Being, to every Christian, by whom the supremacy of Christ over all "principalities and powers" of this world, is not merely subscribed to in words, but acknowledged by the obedience of faith.

How did God, after having solemnly vindicated His glory, and exposed the folly of the choice made by the tribes, proceed to shew that even yet the "casting of the lot was in the lap of the Most High?"

MARY. He made all the people draw near by tribes and families (just as they did about Achan) and Saul was "taken;" but when they sought him he could not be found. Why did he hide himself?

MAMA. Apparently from some remains of the diffidence which made him shrink when first addressed by Samuel as the "desire of all Israel." But how was his place of concealment discovered?

MARY. God revealed it in answer to the people's inquiries; and when they fetched him, he was taller than any one else, from the shoulders upwards. Mama, he must have been a giant.

MAMA. Not that we hear of, but merely a man of remarkable and distinguished stature; such as carnal persons, who judged by the eye, would be prone to admire and obey. With what acclamations was he hailed by his new subjects?

MARY. They cried just as we do, "God save the King."

MAMA. Thereby acknowledging, as we ought still to do when using the same loyal expression, that it is by Him, and Him alone, that kings reign; and that all human authority (a truth too much lost sight of in these days) is derived from and upheld by God.

MARY. What does it mean that Samuel "wrote the manner of the kingdom in a book, and laid it up before the Lord?"

MAMA. Some, and among others the Jewish writer Josephus (a very high authority), say that it was the record of the evils denounced against Israel for desiring a king, which was thus pre served by Samuel for a memorial of the truth of his prediction; while others suppose, probably enough, that the rules and principles of the future kingly government were (after Samuel had rehearsed or "told" them to the people) then committed to writing.

But did all those who had witnessed the solemn inauguration of the first Jewish monarch, acquiesce in the Divine selection and appointment?

MARY. No; a band of men whose "hearts God touched," went home with him; but children of Belial (that means wicked persons, does it not?) said. "How shall this man save us?" Mama, this was despising not Saul, but God who had chosen him!

MAMA. And in what but contempt of the Lord and his "anointed," in a far higher and holier sense—has the guilt of "men of Belial" (or servants of Satan) in all ages consisted? But was it in mere disparaging expressions that this contempt was now manifested?

MARY. Oh, no; they brought Saul "no presents," and that was not treating him like a King, when you know he was ashamed to go near Samuel (who was only a Judge) without one.

MAMA. And did Saul, as might have been expected from one of his age and temper, immediately resent and punish this disrespect?

MARY. No; "he held his peace." But surely, Mama, he could hardly have felt himself to be a King yet, after all that had happened; for, in the next chapter, he was still "coming after the herd out of the field." How strange for a King to be keeping cattle!

MAMA. You forget how long after his anointing, Saul's successor David, kept sheep, an undistinguished, unaspiring shepherd boy. But Saul's election wanted as yet one important confirmation, which we overlooked in our former summary of the events predicted to him by Samuel. For what indispensible ceremony, accompanying all public national engagements among the Jews, did he bid Saul "tarry at Gilgal?"

MARY. Till he should come down to him, and offer "burnt-offerings, and sacrifices of peace-offerings." Oh! I see now that Saul was not fairly King till this was done; but I wonder why Samuel sent the people away, "every one to his house," from Mizpeh, and let Saul go home to Gibeah, without it.

MAMA. The only reason which, at this distance of time, can be assigned for the delay, is the additional honour which would accrue to Jehovah and to the King he had "set up" to defend His people, by the blending of national gratitude for victory over the Ammonites, with the sacrifices designed to commemorate the accession of Saul. And this no doubt would lend them in the eyes of the people tenfold solemnity and interest.

But we must inquire into the occasion and circumstances of this early triumph of one, who was still, in the estimation of some of his proud countrymen, but the simple herdsman of Benjamin. Over what insolent heathen monarch was the conquest achieved?

MARY. Nahash the Ammonite. You told me once the Ammonites were descendants of Lot, and ought to have known better than to hurt the children of Abraham.

M M. True; yet they chose to manifest their unbrotherly hostility, at the time of the Israelites' utmost distress in the wilderness; for which reason God, in His wrath, severed all future bonds of possible amity between them by declaring, that there "should not enter an Ammonite into the house of the Lord for ever."

But what slavish agreement were the pusillanimous men of Jabesh ready to have made with the enemy of their nation and their God?

MARY. They said, "make a covenant with us, and we will serve thee." Surely he must have been mocking, Mama, when he answered he would do it, on condition that he might "thrust out all their right eyes!"

MAMA. Putting out the eyes, barbarous as it naturally appears to us, is so common a form of tyranny in the east, where (horrible to relate) busins full of human eyes have been presented to glut the vengeance of even modern kings of Persia—that the proposal to limit the mutilation to one eye, seems almost to have appeared mercy to the terrified inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead. But why do you suppose was the sacrifice of the right eye insisted on by their oppressor?

MARY. I am sure I don't know.

MAMA. Because it would incapacitate them as tributaries, from all future resistance with bows and arrows, (the then prevailing mode of warfare); while it still left them capable of "serving him" (according to their own abject expression) as slaves. By what expedient did the elders of the unfortunate city of Jabesh endeavour to procure deliverance?

MARY. They sent messengers for help to all the coasts of Israel; but I daresay Nahash thought they would send in vain, else he would not have given them seven days respite.

MAMA. No: and it was therefore as much his arrogant defiance of the God of Israel, as his cruelty to His people, which was so signally avenged by Saul. How, did we say, was this hitherto untried warrior employed, when the pitiful tidings from Jabesh reached his native city of Gibeah?

Many. Following the herd out of the field. And when he heard the people weep, he asked what ailed them; and the "spirit of God came upon him, and his anger was kindled greatly."

Mama. You remember what we remarked in the case of Samson, as to the precise meaning of the "spirit of God" here.

MARY. Yes; you told me it meant supernatural strength and courage; and without both, Saul (the frightened lad who had "hid himself among the stuff" for fear of being king), would never have talked and acted so like one, all of a sudden. But, Mania, Saul's hewing the oxen in pieces, and sending them about, puts me in mind of the poor Levite's wife, though it is not half so shocking.

MAMA. It at least proves to yon, that his expedient (shocking as it seemed), was not unusual or unprecedented. But there is this remarkable difference between them, viz. that while the lamentable spectacle afforded by the mutilated remains of the injured woman were designed to excite compassion,—the object of Saul was to assert authority and awaken fear, and the desired effect seems, in both cases, to have been attained; for while the "heart of the children of Israel was knit as one man" to avenge the wrongs of the Levite, we read here that the "people came out with one consent," to follow the summons of Saul.

How numerous were the forces thus assembled at the call of the youthful king?

MARY. Three hundred thousand men of Israel, besides thirty thousand of Judah. What a number to fight for one town! Well might Saul send word to the men of Jabesh, that by the time the sun was hot on the morrow, they should have "help!"

MAMA. Or rather "deliverance," as the word is more properly rendered. And truly it must have been timely as well as acceptable, for it was on the "morrow" that the trembling victims had agreed to come out to submit to the conditions proposed by the cruel king of Ammon. But what other discomfiture awaited that insolent tyrant and his army?

MARY. Saul divided his people into three companies, and they slew the Ammonites from the morning watch till the heat of the day, and they that remained were so scattered that not two of them were left together.

MAMA. You see now why the Almighty, after graciously vouchsafing to lend His sanction to the appointment of Saul to be king over His people, saw fit to precede, by so signal a mark of His favour and countenauce, the confirmation of his newly assumed power by sacrifice. And if any thing could have added to the reputation which the valour of Saul (aided as it had been by the power of the Most High), had acquired for him with his new subjects—it would have been the train of generosity towards avowed and personal enemies, which formed so pleasing a so trast with the after features of his unhappy and suspicious life.

What was his behaviour, when the indignant people invoked vengeance on the despisers of his youthful authority?

Mary. He said, "There shall not a man be put to death;" and the reason showed him pious as well as forgiving, because "the Lord hath wrought salvation in Israel." I thank! I wonder Said could ever grow wicker!

MAMA. Would that his were the only promise, of excellence in youth, which riper years have failed to bring to maturity; or rather which the sources and seductions of an evil world have sufficed to choke and extirpate! Untried and unslaken, the "mountain" of man's virtue as well as prosperity seems often to "stand strong;" but no sooner does the world smile or God frown, than both (though from widely differing causes) are too easily "moved." Had any one predicted to Saul. when in the overflowings of boyish magnanimity, he would not hear of the death of even "men of Belial," that he should live to take advantage (at the suggestion of Satan) of the compassionate "ministering" of David " to a mind diseased," to aim a deadly weapon at his innocent heart-he would have asked, like Hazael, " Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?" As well might a prophet of evil have whispered to him, amidst the elation of the victory over Nahash, and the fervour of his youthful devotion to the Lord. that, forsaken of the same God, and having survived alike his honour and kingdom, he should miserably court death on the mountains of Gilboa, from the sword of his own servant! So true is it that we know not what a day, the short but chequered day of human life, may bring forth; and so just is the inference drawn from thence by him who had most largely tasted of its vanity, " Boast not thyself of to-morrow!" It is only while upheld in our integrity or our prosperity by an uncring support, that we can answer a moment for either; and surely, in creatures so dependent and powerless, self-confidence (the early rock of Saul) must prove equally ruinous and absurd. Who, when he yet joined in humble deference the name of Samuel with his own in his summons to the people, and bowed in reverential gratitude, while the gray-haired and privileged "Seer" offered peace-offerings for his elevation, to their common Lord-could have foreseen, that ere one short year of sovereignty had shed its perverting influence over his head, he would have sacrilegiously invaded that very

"Seer's" pontifical office, and taken on him to suspend, with ill-judged and valinglorious mercy, the positive sentence of God against a heathen for a white on another and later occasion, he lightly demand to death his only so a for an inadvertent error?

Venea tempted to feel confidence in yourself, or in any human being, left to the uncontrolled way-way it less of a fallen nature—contrast Saul at the after of Gilgal, giving all the glory of his wonderful victory to the Lord—with the same Saul gliding like a thief in the borrowed robes of guilt, to transgress the very law of God he was "set up" to enforce, and seek counsel from spirits of darkness in the cave of Endor!

We may, perhaps, at a future period, resume the history of his annappy reign, on which our plan at present forbids us to enter. In the mean time its chief particulars have. I know, been long familiar to you; sufficiently so to derive from them the instruction I have been endeavouring to impress, of the fallibility of all human resolutions, and the seductive tendency of all earthly greatness. To this we may add one more, deducible from the concluding verse of the chapter before us, viz. the ignorance of short-sighted mortals of all which concerns their true happiness.

" All the men of Israel, and Saul," it is here said, "rejoiced greatly," and why? The former at having exchanged for the equitable dominion of the unchangeable Jehovah, the caprices of the most mutable and fallible of his creatures. The latter at having left the peaceful cares of the herd in his father's fields, for a career whose opening took place, as we have seen, amid strife and bloodshed, whose middle course was embittered by sin and suspicion, and its close poisoned by horror and remorse. So little (as the wise King of Israel remarks) does "man know what is good for him, all the days of his vain life which he spendeth as a shadow."

MORNING TWENTY-FIFTH.

Lesson-1 Samuel, Chapter xii.

M.MA. We are now arrived, my dear Mary, at that solemn concluding act of the direct Divine government (or Theocracy, as it is called, of the Israelites), in which Samuel, the last and best of the Judges, successively "raised up" to be the organs of God's sovereignty among them, having assembled the people over whom he had so long presided—first affectionately appealed to themselves for a testimony to the integrity of his past life; and then assumed (from the unanswerableness of the challenge thus triumphantly made), the right to "reason" or expostulate with them on the higher theme of the greatness and goodness of that God whose dominion they had idly abjured.

By what compliance, (sinful in itself, had it not, for their chastisement, been expressly and judiciously sanctioned by God), had Samuel, now superseded his own authority, and gratified a fickle ungrateful people? Myny. "Behold, I have hearkened unto your voice in all that ye said unto me, and have made a King over you."

MAMA. Yes, Mary; an act of self-devotion, easy, no doubt, to one grown old in the faithful and toilsome service of his country, but which, "e'd and gray-headed" as he then was, Samuel must have lived long enough to see repented of by many of those who had been most clamorous for it; and which he was even spared to annul on the part of the Lord, by the anointing of one more "after his own heart," to sit on the early forfeited throne of Saul.

But Sonnel's office is not now to predict the future, but to dwell on, and recapitulate the past. How long did he say he had "walked before them?"

MARY. " From my childhood unto this day." You know he was a prophet, and in favour with God and man from a child.

MAMA. Yes—thus rewarding, far beyond all carthly distinctions, or even beyond any solace which might have been afforded her by his dutiful behaviour in private life, the piety of that mother who had early dedicated him to God. Before whom was Samuel content to call Israel "to witness?"

Mary. "Before the Lord:" and he was not afraid, even before Him, to ask "whose ox, or whose ass, he had taken," or "whom he had defrauded," or "of whom he had taken a bribe to bload his eyes with." Mama! I fear his sons had tak in many.

MAN. And for that very reason were they now reduced to the condition of private, and justly despised persons in Israel; obnoxions (but for he shield thrown over them by their father's spot ess character) to the prosecution of all whom they had injured. Perhaps it was with a view to the indirect redressing of even the misdeeds, that Samuel offered to make restitution of any unconscious invasion of the property of others. Was any such, however, alleged against him?

MARY. Oh, no! the people answered, "Thou hast not defrauded us, neither oppressed us, neither hast thou taken ought at any man's hand." And they both took God to witness that it was so.

MAMA. How well would it be for us, Mary, could any among us at the close of a moderately long life (one exempt too, from the peculiar snares and temptations of sovereignty), thus fearlessly call on the Judge of heaven and earth, to attest our integrity towards our fellow mortals! From acts of open violence and spoliation, there is little merit in our case in abstaining; but by whom have the morals, the happiness, the good name, of their brethren, been, from the cradle to the grave, religiously respected? Alas! by how many idle examples, and idle words, are the former too often endangered and the latter injured, by those who would count "eppression" immanly, and " defrauding" a beinous sin! To stand with clean hands at the tribucal of even fellow-mortals, is rare in a would whose fraud and over-reaching too often usurp the names of skill and dexterity; but to be able, with claim hearts, confidently to ask, " Whose principles have I shaken by precept or example? or whose welfare have I diminished by unkindness, inadvertence, or even neglect?" is a privilege which the most conscientious Christian would perhaps be the last to arrogate to himself; and yet how easily would this invaluable source of consolation for old age be purchased by a very moderate exercise of Christian recollection and self-denial? Were the negative principle of " cease to do evil," acted upon, in its mere partial sense of abstaining from rash censures and unadvised talk, from how many calamities, occasioned by "firebrands" thrown "in sport," would society be delivered; and from how many snares sown in it by the recklessness of persons, older (but not wiser) than themselves, would the path of the young be happily made free!

But having established his own right to do so.

in what especial character did Samuel plead, or rather " reason," in behalf of the God of Israel?

Mary. As the God that brought their fathers forth out of the Land of Egypt, and "made them dwell in that place."

Mama. And how did he say this God had, ever by them, been requited?

N 'av. They "forgot the Lord their God;" and a me says he "sold them into the hand" of all the wicked men we have read of,—"Sisera, and the Philistines, at 4 the king of Moab."

MAMA. And what is the lumbling and salutary effect ascribed by Samuel to these "righteons acts" of a justly incensed, yet merciful God?

MARY. "They cried unto the Lord, and said, We have sinned, because we have forsaken the Lord, and have served Baalin and Ashtaroth; but now deliver us out of the hand of our enemies, and we will serve thee."

MAMA. Was there any failure on the side of Jehovah in executing His part in this oft broken covenant?

MARY. Oh, no! he sent Jerubbaal, and Jephthah, and Samuel, and delivered them out of the hand of their enemies, and they "dwelt safe."

 MAMA. And was the first improvement of the safety, thus miraculously purchased, a return in sincerity to their alienated God? Mary. I think they generally "served him" as long as the judge who delivered them lived; but no sooner was he taken away than back they went to their idols again.

MAMA. And by what crowning act of ingratitude had they now appropriately summed_up a course of shanneless impiety and revolt?

MARY. They said "Nay, but a king shall reign over us, when the Lord their God was their king." How could they want or wish for another?

MAMA. Just as in the spirit of childish imitation, you "want or wish for" many things possessed by others, as unsuitable to your age, and as inferior to those you would ignorantly barter for them, as the regal government was unfitted for the polity of the Jews, or as the rash fallible mortal "desired" by them was contemptible, when set in competition with the King of Kings. Bu, the "desire" having (as we before saw) been for its own punishment, complied with—on what cop ditions were they and their sovereign to enjoy th undeserved favour of God?

MARY. If they would both "fear the Lo, and not rebel against his commandment." Mamyou know the book of Kings was little better the a history of their "rebellions" against God; and from Jeroboam down, they almost all made, or worshipped idols!

MAMA. And what denunciation (here solemnly recorded) did we find fearfully accomplished in the disastrons close of the Jewish history?

MARY, "The hand of the Lord shall be against you, as it was against your fathers."

MAMA. And how was that? What judgments, unexampled in the history of a nation, vindicated the truth of "Him who cannot lie?"

MARY. Oh! they had famines, and wars, and whe carried captives, and sold into slavery; and Jerusalem was twice destroyed, and the ten tribes (you told me) were utterly swept away.

Mana. This is easily and lightly said, Mary! band thus do a few brief, but awful words, sum up the predicted misfortunes of the rebellions people of God. May we not have traced in vain, for our improvement and humiliation, the correspondence between their unerring fulfilment in our former course of Scriptural reading, and their awful purport as recorded here!

By what "great thing" was the stedfast word of Jehovah attested and solemnized in the eyes of a wondering people?

MARY. God sent thunder and rain, at the prayer of Samuel, in the "time of wheat harvest." Why should this make the Israelites "perceive that their wickedness was great in desiring a king?"

MAMA. Because it would afford a direct miraculous testimony to the truth and solemnity of the censures just passed on the ungrateful Israelites by the courageous Samuel. Did you not once, yourself wouder that Jordan should be said to "overflow its banks all harvest;" a season, you remarked, of severe drought even among ourselves?

MARY. Yes, but you told me it was spring when barley harvest took place, and that snow melting in the mountains, and not rain, made the river swell.

MAMA. I am glad you remembered this; and as the phrase, "former and latter rain," occurs so frequently in Scripture, I am glad too, to take this opportunity of explaining why any deviation from their usual periods, could hardly have happened in Judea but by miracle. The "former" rain (so called contrary to the place we should assign it in the calendar) falls at the end of summer, to refresh the earth after the parching droughts of that totally showerless season (the "wheat harvest" of our chapter), and prepare it for the sowing of winter pulse. And the "latter' rain, occurring usually about the middle of April! is equally indispensible to bring to maturity the grain, which would otherwise infallibly perish in so dry and arid a climate. You will see from this uniform arrangement of Providence, the propriety of the frequent reference to God in Scripture, as the giver or withholder of the "former and latter rain;" while the extreme rarity of rain in summer (the period of "wheat harvest" in Judea) will make you understand why its appearance now, and in so violent and destructive a form, would both rebuke the presumption of the Israelites, and deepen their sense of dependence on an of raded God, for not only the comforts, but absolute necessaries of life. How poor and powerless, amid the thunders of Jehovah, and that unseasonable "opening of the windows of heaven," by which (if not graciously stopped) their hopes of plenty would have been speedily annihilated, must have seemed to them the fellow worm whom they had exalted at the expense of the Creator of heaven and earth! How do we find this humbling consciousness manifested?

MARY. "All the people greatly feared the Lord and Samuel."

MAMA. And what needful service, infinitely beyond the power and province of an earthly monarch, did they implore the "man of God" to perform in their behalf?

MARY. "Pray for thy servants unto the Lord that we die not; for we have added unto all our sins this evil to ask us a king." MAMA. And does Samuel, even in consoling them and granting their request, for a moment extenuate the evil thus tardily admitted?

MARY. Oh! no; though he says "Fear not," yet he does not deny that they had "done all this "wickedness."

MAMA. Let us attend to and improve, my dear Mary, as the most appropriate conclusion we can draw, from a most instructive course of reading, the order, as well as the tenor, of the admonitions here delivered by Samuel to his guilty countrymen. To the Christian, overwhelmed with a sense of conscious unworthiness, may be said on the same Divine authority, and with the yet more endearing sanction of a gospel message, "Fear not." But the example of Samuel may deter the Christian teacher from drawing his encouragement from a mitigated view of the evil of sin. His ground of hope, like Samuel's, must be holier as well as "For His own great name's sake," will he argue, and for the sake of the " enly name given under heaven by which men can be saved," "vour God will not forsake his people;" and this, amid a sense (which no friend to your soul would wish less) of prevailing "wickedness," is your warrant and your encouragement to "follow on, if highly we may attain," to serve him more acceptably in figure.
